

THE HISTORY OF THE GREAT MOGHULS

PRINGLE KENNEDY

Vol. I & II

Collection of Prof. Muhammad Iqbal Mujaddidi Preserved in Punjab University Library.

پروفیسر محمد اقبال مجددی کا مجموعہ
پنجاب یونیورسٹی لائبریری میں محفوظ شدہ

A
HISTORY OF THE GREAT MOGHULS

OR

A HISTORY OF THE BADSHAHATE OF DELHI

From 1598 A.D. to 1739

WITH

AN INTRODUCTION CONCERNING

THE

MONGOLS AND MOGHULS OF CENTRAL ASIA

BY

PRINGLE KENNEDY, M.A., B.L.

1974

SHIVA PUBLICATIONS

Delhi-110006

First Reprint 1974

133463

Published by D. R. Chopra for Shiva Publications, 24, Darya Ganj (Ansari Road) & Printed by Delux
Offset Printers, Old Rohtak Road, Delhi-110035

PREFACE.

---

I HAVE been at work for a very considerable time in getting together the material for this volume. At first I had hoped to have done some original work in the way of translating Persian authorities, not yet translated, and to have incorporated the results in this book. But the engrossing calls of my profession have made the spare time at my disposal very small and the distance at which I live from any good Oriental Library, has made such work practically impossible. I determined, therefore, at an early stage of my task to leave such an undertaking altogether on one side and to make this work one readable by the intelligent man of the street, the person who knows but little of Indian History but has an interest in India. I have not hesitated, as my readers will see, to give my own deductions from the History of India of the 16th Century, as far as these bear upon the great Indian problems of to-day, and in this, however lame and inconclusive my opinions may seem to many, I believe I have done no wrong. The use of history is to teach political wisdom, so said Machiavelli long ago, and the study of Indian History would be robbed of much of its profit if through the glass of the past we never read the present and the future. The fact of the volume having been written at various times and in scraps, will account for a certain amount of repetition which my readers will, I am afraid, find in spite of my attempts at excising the same. They will also, I hope, pardon the length of many of my quotations. These are taken out of books, most of which are not likely to come the way of the general reader and which tell my story better than I can myself. If I can succeed in rousing my readers' interest in the period of Indian History of which I write, I shall feel myself amply-rewarded. I propose in a second volume to carry the story down to the time A.D. 1739 when a second Conqueror, Nadir Shah, entered Delhi and practically ended the Moghul Empire, as Taimur three and a half centuries earlier virtually destroyed the old Afghan rule.

As to the spelling of Eastern names, not writing for the specialist but for the general public, I have spelt them as they are ordinarily spelt, though in certain instances, as for instance in the name of the Prophet and his followers, I have preferred the spelling which most clearly suggests the sound. My readers will note that I write of the Mongols when speaking of the races of Central Asia and of the Moghuls when I write of the Emperors at Delhi and of their followers.

One word as to the name. The main title I have taken for this book is not strictly accurate. More correct is the sub-title, but I am afraid it is too long for ordinary use. Hence I hope the shorter first title will be pardoned.

MOZUFFERPORE,
August 22nd, 1904. }

PRINGLE KENNEDY.

CONTENTS.

PART I.

	PAGE.
CHAPTERS I, II.—Hindustan and its two Great Rivers (Ganges and Indus) ... ..	1—10
CHAPTER III.—Central Asia ... ..	10—12
CHAPTERS IV—VI.—Mongols before Chenghiz's death ... ..	12—21
CHAPTER VII.—Mongols after Chenghiz's death ... ..	21—36
CHAPTER VIII.—Mongols in the West ... ..	36—55
CHAPTER IX.—Mongols of the East in the 14th Century ..	55—57
CHAPTERS X, XI.—Mongols of the Centre—14th and 15th Centuries ... ..	57—71
CHAPTERS XII—XIV.—Taimur and his Invasion of India ...	72—90
CHAPTERS XV, XVI.—Christianity, Muhammedanism and the Mongols ... ..	90—96

PART II.

CHAPTERS I—IV.—From the Sack of Delhi by Taimur to the Battle of Paniput ... ..	97—117
---	--------

PART III.

CHAPTERS I—VIII.—Baber and his Reign at Delhi ... ..	118—167
CHAPTERS IX, X.—Humayun ... ..	167—179
CHAPTERS XI—XV.—Sher Shah and his Successors ... ..	180—227
CHAPTERS XVI—XXXVII.—Akbar and his Conquests ... ..	227—311

HISTORY OF THE GREAT MOGHULS.

---

PART I.

---

CHAPTER I.

HINDUSTAN.

THE term India, as it is now used, to indicate the territory under the direct or indirect rule of the British Crown, denotes a very different tract of country from what was the India of the Classical writers or the Hindustan of the Moghuls. School books teach that India is bounded on the North by the Himalayas, on the West by the Arabian Sea, Beluchistan and Afghanistan, on the South by the Indian Ocean, and on the East by the Bay of Bengal and a country not easily defined, but, roughly speaking, the lands adjacent to the West of South China. For many years a part of Burmah has been subject to the British Crown, and since 1886 the rest of Burmah has also come under the direct rule of England. All this country is often also termed India. Used in this sense, India ceases to be a geographical expression. It becomes a brief description of one of the great political divisions of Asia. But used even in the narrower and commoner sense, India can hardly be considered as a country. It must rather be deemed a Continent. Anything more different than the country, say, round Peshawar and Lahore, and that round Dacca and Chittagong, or the natural features of the country in which Delhi stands and those of the neighbourhood of Seringapatam can hardly be imagined. And as the country is, so are the people. It is a trite saying, that Indian differs from Indian more than Englishman from Neapolitan. The unity, indeed, which in Europe, marks a country and its people, a unity which may not completely exist, but which is still what mainly divides country from country, is not to be looked for in India. Any ideas taken from a study of European political and natural life must be put on one side before we can attempt to understand matters Indian. And yet there are causes that make for unity more powerfully in India than even in the West. Of the most potent of these, the Muhammedan religion, I will have much to say later on. At present I content myself with pointing this out.

The greatest line of division in Indian geographically, physically and ethnically, is between the North of India and the Peninsula. Geographically these two divisions represent very different periods of the Earth's history; the vegetation in the Peninsula is mainly of the tropical kind, the large leafed, comparatively flowerless vegetation of the tropics; in the North the temperate kingdom makes itself everywhere manifest. Owing to the continuity by land the animals of the South and the North are not divided by any very clear line, though there are abundant differences to be pointed out on close inspection; but when one comes to the noblest animal, man, the differences are very great and strike the most inobservant almost as much as they do the historian and the anthropologist.

Hindustan, the country of the Hindus, does not in its proper acceptance include the Peninsula. It does not even include all of what we call Northern India, though in common language the two words are often considered synonymous. The real land of the Hindu proper is only that part of the country which lies within the watersheds of the Indus and the Ganges, together with most of the hilly and sandy tract now known as Rajputana. Northern India contains much more than this. In addition to the provinces of Malwa and Khandesh, which can hardly be considered as parts of the Peninsula, and the countries we have just mentioned, the land within the watershed of the Brahmaputra, as far as it is India at all, would come within the term Northern India as it is commonly used. But the land within this watershed has had but little to do with the history of India, very little indeed to do with the history of Moghul India, with which I am particularly interested. When either the Peninsula known to Indian historians as the Déccan, or the Brahma-putra lands come into notice in this book they will be treated more or less as foreign countries. The rule of the Moghul never established itself in either of them with any permanency. As portions of Armenia and Mesopotamia were at times in Roman history overrun by Roman armies, but never thoroughly brought within Roman influence, so has been the case with the Déccan and the Brahma-putra Valley. In the time of the last Great Moghul, Aurungzeb, indeed, we have Moghul soldiers very far south;* but they are there, rather as carriers out of magnified razzias, than as the precursors of a regular Moghul administration. And so with the Brahma-putra Valley. Now and then a Moghul expedition ascends this mighty river, a petty King or two is defeated, some towns destroyed; and then the rains come, and the invader has to retreat, if happily he can retreat, and the result has been like little Peterkin's glorious victory, so much and nothing more.

Even in the more circumscribed area to which we have now confined ourselves, we will find that we have to leave a considerable part out in order to get a just view of Moghul India. And here I must warn my readers from confounding Moghul India with Muhammedan India. In the Peninsula, as we will see, there flourished prosperous Muhammedan kingdoms, but these were not Moghul either in origin or development. The ruling Muhammedan influence was not Moghul but either Arab or Persian, the so-called Hubshi† or Abyssinian, who is a close kinsman of the Arab, having often a predominant influence.

In the Empire established by the Moghuls we will find three towns pre-eminent, so much so, indeed, that the history of the Empire may be considered in one light, as but little more than the history of the rulers of these towns. These three cities are Lahore, Delhi, Agra. Milton, when speaking of the Moghul Empire, writes,

* But all the same even as far as Cape Comorin from the time of Aurungzeb on we find numerous administrative arrangements which are directly traceable to Moghul influence.

† Hubshi is translated in the dictionaries, commonly, as negro. It is used, however, chiefly by Muhammedan historians for an Abyssinian, who, I need hardly say, is not of the race commonly known to us as negroes.

And thence to Agra and Lahore of Great Moghul.*

At the present day it sounds strange to associate any city more closely than Delhi with the fortunes of the Great Moghul, but yet Milton in his description was perfectly right. For a long period, roughly speaking from the middle of the sixteenth to the middle of the seventeenth century, Delhi is an Imperial city, had ceased to exist. It was abandoned by Akbar, who, for a variety of reasons, preferred Agra, and gradually sunk into ruins. The present city of Delhi, commonly known amongst Muhammedans as Shahjahanabad, was founded by Shah Jahan well in the middle of the seventeenth century. It is situated at a considerable distance from old Delhi. Within the ambit of its walls, for New Delhi almost alone of towns of any size in India is surrounded by a wall, there is but one memorial of any note of the Afghan rule that preceded the Moghul, a mosque, known as the Kala Musjid. This is more interesting to the antiquarian than to the historian, for though it is an excellent specimen of the early heavy Afghan style of building, no memories of any importance attach themselves to its name. In Milton's younger days wanderers to the East if they wished to see the Great Moghul, would either find him in his Capital Agra, or on one of his camping expeditions in which Lahore was often the objective, as being on the road to Kashmir and Afghanistan. When reached, Lahore was often favoured as the Muhammedan historian would term it with a lengthy visit from the shadow of omnipotence. This town's importance indeed entirely arose from its being a half-way house. All conquerors of Hindustan from Muhammad of Ghazni in the eleventh century down to Ahmad Shah Abdali in the eighteenth have made straight for it. After crossing the Indus, its site seem to have been chosen almost by nature, as the first halting place of an advancing force. Sher Shah, the Afghan ruler of Behar, who turned Humayun, the second of the Moghuls, out of India, and ruled in his stead at Delhi and Agra, had the true instinct when he regretted on his deathbed that he had not destroyed Lahore. That city, he said, existed on the very road of an invader. After capturing it, an invader can there collect his supplies and organise his resources. Such has been the case in past invasions of India, and the peculiar geographical formation of the Punjab with its sandy deserts to the South make it probable that if invasion ever sweep India again from the North-West, it will again pass the same way, through the same city Lahore.

---

* Book XI, p. 334.

But if Lahore be the half-way house, Delhi is the real capital of any ruler of Upper India. And so with intervals it has been for very many centuries, stretching back to at least ten centuries before the birth of Christ, Ancient Hastinapura, where the Pandus and Kurus grew up together, has its site not far from Modern Delhi. When Muhammedan invasion first sweeps over the land, we find the Rajput rulers of Delhi the foremost in their opposition. When Muhammad Ghorī strikes Prithvi Rai, the Rajput ruler of Delhi, to the dust at Thaneswar at the end of the twelfth century, the Rajput rule over Hindustan comes to an end. And as long as the Afghan Muhammedan sovereigns, who ruled from the battle of Thaneswar A. D. 1193 to the battle of Panipat in A. D. 1526, reigned at Delhi, even if their reign did not reach to further than ten miles from the City, so long were they considered by Muhammedans and Hindus alike as the lawful rulers of Hindustan. Delhi is indeed situated in an unrivalled position as the Capital of a race, whose strength comes from the high lands of Central Asia. It is near enough to the lands from which the warriors who are the main source of such a race's strength come, for a continuous stream of such warriors ever to be able to reach there. Behind it to the West, it is fortified by the wastes of the Punjab. On the outskirts of Rajputana it is a check to all invasions by the Rajput Chiefs, and situated as it is near where the Jumna, one of the twin streams that jointly make the mighty Ganges and water the most fertile part of India, comes from the hills, it commands the fertile country to the South and the East. One of the main sources of strength of the Moghul Empire was this endless stream of warriors from the deserts and mountains of Central Asia. When this source was dammed up; when Moghul and Afghan ceased to pour in numbers through the North-Western passes, in the hope of acquiring high dignity and great fortunes under the Delhi Emperor's rule, when India for the Indians, in Akbar's time and in that of the following reigns, to adapt modern a political phrase, became the rule, from that time the days of the Moghul were numbered.

England, too, has one of her main sources of strength in the annual pouring of Englishmen into Hindustan through her great seaports. Calcutta and Bombay stand in the same relation to English rule that Delhi did to Moghul. It is through them that England's greatness flows. Shut off this supply, and England's power in India goes at once. As long as England rules supreme in Eastern seas, as long the English steamer, with its mighty heaving many horse-powered engines, rides without rivalry in the Indian Ocean, so long and no longer is India English. Bombay and Calcutta are as naturally and rightly English Capitals (not far away Simla or any other retreat, however pleasant, between which and the mighty Ocean hundreds of miles intervene) as was Delhi the natural and rightful Capital of the Great Moghul.

Agra is of comparatively modern times. It first springs into importance in the beginning of the sixteenth century. A Muhammedan historian tells us that Sultan Sikandar Lodi, the immediate predecessor of Ibrahim, who fell at Panipat A. D. 1526 and who was the last of the old Pathan Sultans, desired to found a town on the Jumna which might be the Head-quarters of his army. Accordingly he sent out certain of his Councillors on an exploring expedition down the river. Having chosen the site, where Agra now stands, they communicated their choice to the Sultan. He came to inspect the place so chosen. When he came near he observed two elevated places, both of which seemed suitable for building; on enquiry from Mihtar Mulla Khan, who was called Naik and commanded the royal barge, which of these two mounds appeared to him the more suitable, he replied, that which is Agra, or in advance, is the preferable one. The Sultan smiled, and said the name of this city shall then be Agra. The city rapidly grew, and in the time of Akbar became definitely the Capital of the Moghul Empire, continuing so until the days of the decadence, when Delhi again became the chief seat of the Emperor. But although Agra was the Capital in the palmiest days of Moghul rule, as a metropolis it is not to be compared with Delhi either in natural advantages or in position. Akbar's choice of it was probably mainly due to his Hinduising policy and his desire to make his kingdom as independent as possible of support from Central Asia, a policy certainly laudable enough in itself, but which, as I have pointed out, had much to do with the eventual downfall of the Moghul Empire, and the substitution in its place, not of the loyal and honourable Rajput, but of the crafty and predatory Mahratha.

---

CHAPTER II.

THE two great rivers of the Hindustan concerning which I write are the Indus and the Ganges; both rise not far from each other, one from the Northern and the other from the Southern side of the snowy ranges of the Himalayas. The Indus for many hundreds of miles keeps to the North of the Himalaya barrier, making a large sweep to the North of Kashmir, only breaking through the hills at a very great distance from its source. The streams which make up the Ganges, on the other hand, after a comparatively short journey through the lower ranges of the Himalayas reach the plains of India at Hurdwar; and from there the Ganges as one stream without interruption makes its way through the most fertile part of India, taking in affluents from all sides, until in Lower Bengal it breaks into many deltaic streams and thus reaches the sea.

The difference between the lands about the two rivers is no less marked than the difference between the rivers themselves. Almost the whole course of the Indus from Attock to the sea is through a sandy desert, through which the western river, after it loses the high velocity which it has as a hill stream, meanders along a course by no means over well defined. Its great tributaries flow through lands not much richer in vegetation than are the lands surrounding the Indus itself. Within a few miles of these streams agriculture flourishes and indeed, wherever river water can be brought by artificial means, agriculture is possible, but throughout a great part of the Punjab and Sind, the provinces through which the Indus and her affluents flow, the land is a barren Sahara, unfit for any population save the scantiest.

Far different is the case of the Ganges. On either side her waters are augmented by those of mighty tributaries. The greatest is the Jumna which bursts from the Himalayas, not far to the West of Hurdwar and is almost as large a stream as the Ganges itself. And besides the Jumna, the Ganges has, joining her on the northern side, many mighty streams flowing from the snows of the Himalayas; on the southern side also she receives the waters of rivers, such as the Sone, which fertilise a large tract of country. On either side of her course for hundreds of miles the land is fertile even at a great distance from the stream. This more particularly is the case on the northern and eastern bank, where there may be in many places rank jungle, but where sandy desert is unknown and where there are no hills intervening between the lower Himalayas and the river herself. On the southern side both desert and hills encroach, but still the amount of fertile land is immensely greater than what is to be found on either bank of the Indus. Consequently of the two rivers, the Ganges has had much the greater influence in the History of India. She is to the Hindu what the Nile is to the Egyptian or the Volga to the Russian. The early people, whose sacred poem was the Rigveda and who came from the far West, tarried for a time upon the banks of the Indus, but only for a time. They soon found that the real abode of the Aryans was further East and within a few hundred years from the time that they first crossed the Indus, they were found permanently settled in Aryavarta, i.e., in the Upper Gangetic plain. The history of the land through which the Ganges flows is really the history of India. On her banks arose those great mixed systems of Theology, Philosophy, and social order which we know as Hinduism and Buddhism, which are the special claim of Hindustan to the attention of the thinking world. It was also along the banks of the Ganges, that the main scenes in the history alike of Muhammedan and English invasion have been played.

I have already referred to the great cities of the Moghul. Of these, Delhi alone was great in pre-Muhammedan time, it being pre-eminently the home of the Rajput, the warrior and the King. To know, however, Hindu India aright, one has to know neither Raja nor soldier, one has to know and to appreciate the Pundit. His city of cities is not Delhi but Benares, the great city dedicated to Mahadeo, the God of destruction, which with its thousand and one temples overlooks the Ganges in her middle course. This city represents alike the genius of Hinduism and Buddhism, the creeds of men residents of a torrid clime, where all things tend towards contemplation rather than action, passivity rather than activity, where to man all life seems more or less weariness and vexation of spirit and where death, non-being, is an object of desire rather than of fear, an aspiration rather than a dread. There the great centre of attraction is not a temple but a burning ghat, where the pyre is ever burning. Ram Ram Suth hai; Ram is true; men pass away, like the bubbles of a river, sparkling, bursting, borne away; but the permanent force of the Universe, its soul ever remains, and it is to both the Hindu and Buddhist alike, though the latter is not to be found in Benares, now having abandoned the city, however, only after having placed his permanent mark therein, the greatest aim to be absorbed into this universal soul, to leave all personal identity and to be again what one was before birth, unseparated, non-differentiated from the universal mind. Such creeds tend to produce contemplative dreamers, mild saints, but not men of action, soldiers, statesmen, and not the least of the reasons why India has been conquered again and again, has been that Hinduism in its innermost essence is not a creed, capable of rousing a race to common action, of inspiring it with a determination to do. To die, yes ; this Hinduism can do ; but to act, this is not of it nor from it.

CHAPTER III.

CENTRAL ASIA.

From the Hindu Kush stretching North and South-East go out two gigantic mountain masses the southern of which, known for the greater part of its length as the Himalayas, is the northern boundary of India, and the northern of which, known as the Thian Shan and by many other names, is the southern boundary of what we know as Siberia. Between these two mountain ranges is a land, having enormous plateaus and vast deserts. Only towards the East, in the land known now as Manchuria, is there any great quantity of fertile land. Wherever, elsewhere, there are to be found oases, these are the results of streams flowing from the mountains of the North or the South. At some time, geologically, not very distant this land was at the bottom of an inland Ocean. Receding, it has left behind it an enormous quantity of sand ; and the deserts in it are probably greater and drier than those to be found anywhere else on the earth. Even now the drying process is going on ; the ancient Lob Nor, once a large lake, has dried up, and the new Lob Nor also shows signs of a diminution in its volume of water. Modern discoveries have found in different parts of the country buried cities, dried up water-courses. In the central part of this country rain but seldom falls. If any clouds manage to cross the lofty Himalayas, they generally hurry across to South Siberia, leaving but very little of their refreshing waters for this Central district.

This country has been inhabited for ages by wandering tribes, bearing many names ; the commonest of which are Turks Mongols and Manchus. The latter live in the far East and with them I have nothing to do. The Mongols were the Central tribe, the Turks the Western. These latter, indeed, are found in history largely outside of the country of which I now write, either in the valleys of the Oxus and Jaxartes or in the lands to the S.-E. of the Caspian and Aral Seas, but the original home of them as far as they are of non-Aryan origin, is this Central Asian Zone. Probably these three races were more or less cognate in blood; but the Turk, who has lived for ages in the West in close contiguity to Persia and the Iranian inhabitants thereof, has become by inter-marriage with these latter markedly different in physical characteristics from the Moghul, who has roamed for centuries over the wild steppes of the middleland and never inter-married with a foreign race. The Natives of India commonly talk of any fair foreigner, particularly of Persians as Moghuls; but this is a misuse of terms. The real Mongol is the hideous hairless flat-faced denizen of Central Asia. The great Emperors of India had but little Mongol blood in their veins; they were really Turks. They called themselves Moghuls to maintain their connection with Chenghiz Khan, the scourge of Asia in the early thirteenth century; but they are known by Indian and other historians as Chagatai Turks.

The Turk has made a great name for himself in this world's history. His is the Sultanate at Constantinople; his has been the Padshahate at Delhi. He has not been a pure destroyer as the Mongol. A Muhammedan within a century or two after the Hegira, he entered into the spirit of Arab civilization, and though he has worked this out after his own fashion, he has never relapsed into utter savagery. But still he has always more or less retained the characteristics which mark his Central Asian ancestry. Atavism is to be discovered constantly in his dealings with his fellow-man, and he who studies the Mongol annals of the middle ages from Chenghiz on, will find it not difficult to understand the outbursts of blood thirstiness and cruelty in Osmanli Turkey and in Moghul India. To one desiring to study Moghul rule in India, a brief account of the Mongol and with it Central Asian history from the time of Chenghiz down to Baber's invasion will probably be of considerable assistance. Such will be found in the following pages.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MONGOLS.

THE Mongols were at first merely one tribe of a great confederacy; their name was probably extended to the whole when the prowess of the Imperial House which governed it gained the supremacy.* "The word itself is (according to Schmidt) derived from the word Mong, meaning brave, daring, bold." In the early Chinese records Mongols are described much like to what they are now, when met in their native wilds, dirty, wandering, uncivilized but much enduring. A favourite hero of their early traditions is Kutulakhan, and from the description of him we may easily learn what manner of men the Mongols deemed their beau ideal of a hero.† "Kutulakhan's voice is compared to the thunder in the mountains, his hands were strong like bear's paws, and with them he could break a man in two as easily as an arrow may be broken. He would lie naked near an immense brazier in the winter, heedless of the cinders and sparks that fell on his body, and, on awakening, would mistake the burns merely for the bites of insects. He ate a sheep a day, and drank immense quantities of Kermis (fermented mare's milk)." Such is the man the Mongols delighted to honour. Great strength, great endurance, great appetite; men of a race with such ideals may overrun the world. Powerful they are for destruction; construction is not in them or from them. Of such men the type is Chenghiz Khan, the Scourge of God. He took himself this name when he took Bokhara. We are told that on that occasion he collected the chief inhabitants in the Musalia, or place set apart for public prayer, and thus addressed them:‡ "You have committed great faults, and the chiefs and leaders of the people are the greatest criminals. If you need any proof of my statement, I answer that I am the Scourge of God. If you were not great criminals, God would not have permitted me to have thus punished you?" In Howorth's learned book on the Mongols* we read "Justice, tolerance, discipline, virtues that make up the modern ideal of a state, were taught and practised at his (Chenghizes Court." Of the two first certainly we can find but little trace. If by tolerance is simply meant the non-molesting of people for religious beliefs, the statement may be true. The Mongol, as far as he was not a pure believer in Sorcery, had a general belief that all religions had more or less of truth and more or less of non-truth in them, a belief I may say not peculiar to Akbar or Herbert Spencer, and although he killed on little or no provocation, he did not have a special inquisition for religious heterodoxy; still, persons accused of being evil agencies, had but short shrift given them. But he was absolutely careless of human life. The accounts of the campaigns of Chenghiz Khan and his generals in Persia on the West and in China in the East are perhaps the most revolting chapters in the world's history, whether we consider the hecatombs, which sober historians reckon at millions, whole cities and provinces being totally depopulated, or the treachery by which so many of the Mongol victories were brought about. Absolute contempt for human life; absolute disregard for the most solemn promises—such were the ruling marks of the Mongol in his day of conquest. And such we may say, though vastly softened by the civilising and humanising influences of Muhammedanism are two of the most prominent features in the history of the great Moghuls of India. The story told concerning Akbar by one of his Panegyrist, how, coming out earlier than usual from his bedroom, he found the lamps unlit and the lamp-lighter asleep, and how he ordered him to be dashed over the battlements, shows that the Mongol spirit was still alive in him. And the treacherous conduct of Aurangzeb towards his brother Murad was as gross as anything recorded in the annals of the heathen Mongols of the thirteenth century. Heathen they were and of a very low type, viz., that known commonly as Shamanism. Idols are worshipped in this form of religion, but its special feature is the influence of Shamans. These persons differ not very greatly from African rain-doctors. They profess to practise astrology, to have communication with demons and familiars. Their main power lies in the fact that they pretend to have information from the unseen world, as to those who are about to cause misfortune in the future. Such persons, I need hardly say, become doomed. Mongol history is full of executions and murders arising out of these announcements of the Shamans.

* Howorth's Mongols, Vol. I, p. 27. † Howorth's Mongols, Vol. I, pp. 43, 44.

‡ Howorth's Mongols, Vol. I, p. 78.

---

* Howorth's Mongols, Vol. I, p. 49.

Cruelty, disregard of plighted promise or word, such were the two greatest features of the Mongol or Tartar character, features which have never been eradicated in their past history and which seem not likely to be eradicated in the future. But while speaking of the evil side of their character, it is but fair to look also at their good side. Great endurance, cheerfulness under the most adverse circumstances, such are certainly virtues of no common order, and such the Mongols undoubtedly possessed and possess. Many of these virtues are indeed swept away when they settle for generations in a country with a warm and enervating climate such as India.

In order to keep the Turk and Mongol stock vigorous and virile, it is necessary to have continually new immigrants from the North-West—so when Akbar stopped this stream, he sapped the very roots of Moghul dominion. Within a hundred years of Akbar's death his great Empire was fast hastening to decay. The Mahratta freebooter was overrunning the land, and instead of having to meet him, troops, who had learnt endurance in the temperate lands of Afghanistan and Turkistan, the Great Moghul could only put against him the local Muhammedan of inferior physique and comparatively small moral force or the Rajput of Rajasthan, who, brave and chivalrous as he is, has not, owing to a variety of causes, the making of a first class soldier. Neither of these were any match for the Mahratta; the large limbed son of Central Asia would have been. And when Nadir Shah later on invaded India, there were again no soldiers fit to meet him. Such, too, will be the fate of British India, if she ever cease to put her main trust in her white soldiers, born and bred in far away England, in a cold clime, far away from all the enervation caused by India. Brave and active as our native soldier is, still after all, England's hold and rule in India must ultimately in the last resort depend upon the ever-changing legions that come from England herself. Deolali is the cradle, I once saw it stated by some eminent medical authority of the British Indian Empire. And so Afghanistan and still more Turkistan were really the cradles of the Moghul power.

---

CHAPTER V.

CHENGHIZ KHAN'S original name was Temujin, a word which means the best iron or steel. He was born in 1155 A.D., far off in the North-East at a place Dilun Boldak near the river Onan. It is said that he had a piece of clotted blood in his fist when born and a man of blood he was from early youth till death. He was brought up in the severe school of adversity. His father died when he was thirteen, and from that time he had to struggle with the other hordes of the desert who knew not him or his father's house. Once he was taken prisoner. To keep him prisoner he was fastened to the cangue, the instrument of torture used by the Chinese, consisting of two boards which are fastened to the shoulders, and when joined together round the neck form an effectual barrier to desertion. He escaped, while his captors were feasting, and in order to conceal himself had to hide in a pond with only his nostrils out of the water. There he was discovered by one of his pursuers. Instead of surrendering him, this pursuer took pity on him and sent him away to his own people. On another occasion he is said to have defeated a hostile horde, and, on obtaining a victory, to have boiled many of his prisoners alive in seventy caldrons. This story, Howorth doubts, but it is entirely in consonance with Chenghiz's character. On a third occasion he was left for dead on the field of battle. One of his followers "melted the snow with some hot stones and bathed him with it so as to free his throat from the blood," and another kept him warm during the long winter night with his own cloak. Again and again we read of him in the greatest distress. But finally he conquered all the neighbouring hordes, and in the year 1203 at a Kuriltai or general assembly of the hordes was proclaimed Khan. Three years later, at another Kuriltai, he was acclaimed by a Shaman as Chenghiz Khan, the very mighty Lord. His first foreign conquests were in the direction of China; then having conquered the Nomad tribes to the West, who had not yet submitted to his sovereignty, he fell on the Muhammedan countries of Western Asia. The countries now known as Afghanistan, Beluchistan, Persia (save some of the North-West) and Turkistan were then ruled by Muhammad, the ruler of Khwarism. In ten years this Sultanate was levelled to the dust, and the countries composing it so devastated, that never again have they been what they formerly were. According to Howorth, Muhammad provoked the war. If so he was terribly punished, for in it not only he himself, but almost every male member of his family perished. A letter of Chenghiz Khan's is preserved in which he wrote, "Commanders, elders, commonly know that God has given me the Empire of the earth from the East to the West, whoever submits shall be spared, but those who resist, shall be destroyed with their wives, children and dependents." Whether the former promise was fulfilled is doubtful; that the latter threat was, is certain. Bokhara, Samarkand, Balkh, Nishapur, Herat, all the most famous towns of the Muhammedan East, towns that had flourished, while our European towns, North of the Alps were mostly in primitive infancy, were given over to plunder and destruction. Muhammedan historians give the number of the killed in millions. Occasionally artizans were spared; young persons, too, were sometimes preserved for the harem, but otherwise the slaughter was complete. At Bokhara, Chenghiz Khan himself climbed the steps of the great Mosque and gave the signal to plunder by declaring in a loud voice : " The hay is cut, give your horses fodder." At another place seventy thousand men, women and children were said to have been tied together and shot by the Mongol soldiers with arrows. On a suspicion that precious stones might be swallowed and so concealed, Chenghiz Khan gave an order to disembowel the prisoners. This war reached as far as the banks of the Indus. There the Mongols attacked Jelaluddin, one of the last of the royal house of Khwarism, who, when he saw that his troops were being cut to pieces and that he had no further hope of victory, mounted a fresh horse, took off his cuirass and jumped with the horse into the river, which was flowing twenty feet below. He was not followed and safely reached the other side. A part of the Mongol army subsequently crossed the river and laid siege to Multan. But the heat was too great for these sons of the steppes and back they went again to the higher lands on the West of the Indus. After conquering Khwarism, Chenghiz Khan's hordes pushed further North and West, attacking the Russians in what is now known as Southern Russia. At the same time they vigorously carried on war with the kingdoms of China. Everywhere were Chenghiz's arms successful. When after years of foreign warfare he came back at length to his own native fastnesses, the greater part of Asia and a part of Europe had become subject to him. I may well quote here Howorth's reflections on the grand Kuriltai, which Chenghiz Khan held at his home-coming :

* " What a wonderful gathering that must have been. We are much impressed in reading the history of the Middle Ages, with the effect of the Crusades, which brought the parochial minded chivalry of Western Europe into contrast with the land of so much gorgeous romance as the East, and gave an impetus to thought and action, and an enlargement of view that had more than aught else to do perhaps with the social and mental resolution of the revival of learning. But what were the Crusades as an experience to the journey of Chenghiz and his troops ?

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 99.

Born and accustomed only to the dreary and steppe lands of the Gobi desert, and its girdle of pine-covered mountains, their triumphant march led them through the very garden of Asia, among its most refined and cultured inhabitants and through its most prosperous cities. Every step must have been a new chapter of romance, such as boys in England find in the Arabian Nights, and the vast caravans of treasure that they brought back with them must have been objects of intense wonder to the wives and daughters of the returning warriors, as the tales they told of their adventures must have seemed like the romances of ballad makers, rather than the truthful experiences of ingenuous soldiers. Nor were the crowds of captives, chiefly artizans, a less important, if a somewhat less picturesque, element in the cavalcade. With them there went to the further East all the knowledge and craft possessed by the Muhammedans, and if we find the period of Mongol supremacy in China to be a period of revival in art and manufacture, a period of great literary energy, we must not forget what a number of names in the administration of that period are Persian and Turkish, and how the rubbing together of two widely different civilisations, which have crystallised apart, such as those of China and Persia, necessarily leads to a fresh period of ideas and discoveries, being the most potent example of the law, condensed for us in the venerable proverb, that "iron sharpeneth iron."

On the 18th of August, 1227 A. D., Chenghiz Khan, at the age of 60, died. Stories of his dying words are various. One told by a Chinese historian runs thus :—* "Be you a fruitful friend to my widow and to my two orphan sons, and be ever true to them without fear. The precious jade-stone has no crust and the polished dagger no dirt upon it. The body that is born is not immortal. It goes hence without home or resting place. This keep in everlasting memory; the glory of an action is that it should be complete. Firm and unbending is the heart of the man who keeps his plighted word. Be not guided by the wishes of others, so you will gain the goodwill of many." Sound words and true, but having a strange ring when we remember who the utterer of them was. Another report * also given by Howorth is that he collected his children and dependents about his bed and gave them serious counsel. "He bade his children cling together; we are told he repeated to them the old parable of the bundle of sticks. In his case, however, arrows took the place of sticks. He added another fable not so well known in the West, namely, that of the snakes with several heads. One night during an impending frost it set out to seek shelter in a hole, but on the way the heads began to quarrel and fight with one another, and the result was that it was frozen to death; not so the snake with one head and many tails; this hid everything away safely in the hole and was saved." The second report is much more characteristic of the man than the first. He died away from Mongol land and his body had to be carried there. Not even with his death, did grim death lose his prey. The corpse was secretly carried to Mongolia, and to prevent the news of his death spreading, its escort killed every one they met. Strains from the chants of the mourners are given by Howorth:

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 104.

* Whilom thou didst stoop like a falcon; a rumbling wagon now bundles thee off, O my King.

Circling in pride like an eagle whilom thou did'st lead us, O my King.

But now thou hast stumbled and fallen like an unbroken colt, O my King.

For six and sixty years thou hast brought thy people peace and joy and now dost thou leave them, O my King.

The place of the burial is called by Rashid, God's Hill. Certain it is that he was buried on the Altai steeps with a mound, not a mausoleum, for the Mongol was not a Muhammedan, over him. There the greatest destroyer, probably in the whole world's history, at last lay still. He had found the Mongols, a number of wandering and dislocated hordes, and had formed them into a nation. He had deeply implanted into the minds of his followers, the supreme virtue of obedience. The Empire which he founded, survived him for a hundred years and more, and then split up. After his death, it became, as will shortly be seen, even wider than in his time; but the essence of stability was not there, and little by little the Mongol Empire of Mid Asia became disintegrated and went the way of all such kingdoms to pieces, not, however, without bearing offspring more or less remote. From it sprang up the present Empire of China; from it too, in a certain sense, may be said to be derived the "Padshahate" of the Great Moghuls at Delhi.

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 106.

CHAPTER VI.

CHENGHIZ'S, and indeed the whole Mongol nation's favourite amusement, when not at war, was hunting. The great winter hunt was more like a campaign than anything else. An enormous tract of country was enclosed; little by little the circle contracted, and into the inmost circle thus formed, first the Khan, his wives, for they lived the same outdoor life as their husband, and his immediate attendants entered; then, when they were tired of killing, the great chiefs had their turn, and finally the circle was open for all.

The laws of Chenghiz were, as may well be fancied, of the Draconian order. Death was the ordinary punishment; torture to extort confessions was common. In his code, I quote again Howorth,* "he preserved many curious superstitious notions that the popular creed had sanctified. Thus it was forbidden to make water in a stream or on ashes, to have props or legs to a house, a table or a chair, to wash the hands in running water. It was forbidden to wash clothes, which were to be used till worn out; cooking and domestic vessels were not to be washed, and this custom still prevails, according to Pallas, among the Kalmuks, who always clean these articles with dried grass or a piece of felt. Carpino tells us, they would not touch fire with a knife or take their food with the same implement out of a kettle, or strike with a hatchet near a fire. To break these rules was to bring misfortune, or to cause it to thunder in the popular eyes, and, no doubt, as D'Ohsson remarks, the origin of the prohibition was originally a fear of offending the elements. In killing an animal it must be laid on its back, an incision made in its belly, and the heart torn out or squeezed with the hand; this practice is still that of the Kalmuks, who attribute its introduction to Chenghiz Khan. Those who killed animals in the Muhammedan way must themselves be killed. One story more of Chenghiz and I have done with him.* "What is the greatest happiness in life," he one day asked his generals. One answered for the rest: "To go a hunting in a spring morning, mounted on a beautiful horse, carrying on your hand a good falcon and watching it seize its foes." "No," said Chenghiz, "the greatest pleasure is to vanquish your enemies, to chase them before you, to rob them of their wealth, to see those dear to them bathed in tears, to ride their horses, to clasp to your bosom their wives and daughters."

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 111.

---

CHAPTER VII.

THE MONGOLS AFTER CHENGHIZ'S DEATH.

THE vast kingdom created by Chenghiz Khan held together for a considerable time after his death. After an interregnum of two years, in 1229 A. D., his son Ogotai became Khan of the Mongols, and with his succession carnage began to abate. Still the Mongols are willing to shed seas of blood, but blood becomes less the corner-stone of Mongol policy. An Empire, says one of his advisers, to Ogotai, may be conquered on horseback; it cannot be governed so. The wars with China, which ended in the Mongols becoming the rulers of that country, went on steadily throughout Ogotai's and his successors' reigns. The Mongols only stopped when the sea stopped their further progress. They did indeed attempt to conquer Japan but never succeeded in lodging themselves there. The details of these wars are beyond my province, which is not to write a history of the Mongols in Central and Eastern Asia, but rather to show, what manner of men they were, after whom the Delhi Empire of the sixteenth and seventeenth century took its name, and to some extent its caste. A story we read of Ogotai and his brother Tulin reminds one of a story subsequently to be told concerning Baber and his eldest son Humayun. Ogotai fell ill. His brother Tulin approached the bed and raising aloft the wooden vessel in which the Shamans had placed their consecrated liquor, thus addressed his God: "Great God, Eternal being, if thou punishest according to man's guilt, thou knowest that I am more culpable than he; I have killed more people in war, I have harried more women and children, I have made more tears to flow from fathers and mothers; if thou summonest one of thy children because of his beauty or merit, I still claim to be more worthy; take me in the place of Ogotai and make his disease pass to me." Ogotai recovered, Tulin died. According to a custom common among certain races, Tulin's name, which meant mirror, was no more pronounced after his death. In the West, Jelaluddin, whom I have mentioned as fleeing to India on the death of Chenghiz, recovered the greatest part of his father's dominions. Not only did he do so, but he invaded Georgia and Circassia in one direction, and in another threatened the Caliph at Baghdad. A true Turcoman, he and his troops alike lived on plunder. But his career was short. Defeated in battle by the Mongols, he was slain in a Kurdish encampment where he had taken refuge, by a Kurd whose brothers he had killed in one of his wars. With him the Khwarism Shahs came to an end. The Mongols overran the lands he had held for a short time, and although there was not a human harvest waiting for them similar to that which Chenghiz had reaped, they did their work, thoroughly enough. "The people," * says Howorth, "seemed stupified." The historian Ibn-ul-athir gives some examples of the decrepitude to which they were reduced; a Mongol entered a populous village, and proceeded to kill the inhabitants one after another without any one raising a hand. Another wished to kill a man and having no weapon with him, told him to lie down while he went for a sword, with this he returned and killed the man, who in the meantime had not moved. An officer with twenty-seven men met a Mongol, who was insolent, he ordered them to kill him; they said they were too few, and he had actually to kill him himself; having done which, all immediately fled.

---

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 131.

It was during the Khanate of Ogotai that the Mongols advanced into Russia. In December 1240 they took by storm Kief, the Russian Mother of Cities. Pressing further West, crossing the Carpathians, they overran modern Hungary, storming Buda Pesth and advancing well into Modern Austria. They were foiled by the walls of Spalatro on the Adriatic and do not seem to have advanced far beyond Hungary in the North. In the South they overran a great part of the Balkhan Peninsula. How systematic the destruction effected by these hordes was, we are told by Roger, a Canon of Varardin. Where they intended to winter they saved everything; when they left they destroyed everything, and on their homeward march they traversed the forests to spy out and destroy everything that had escaped the first invasion; the captives were fed on the entrails, the feet and the heads of the cattle, which served for food to the Tartars.

One story too characteristic of the Mongol character to be passed over, and I have done with Ogotai. "It was reported among the Uirats that the Khakan (Ogotai) intended to marry their daughters to men of other tribes and they immediately affianced them. When Ogotai heard of this, he ordered all the girls above seven years old of that tribe and those who had been married during the year, to be ranged in a row to the number of 4,000. Having picked out the fairest for himself and his officers and sent others to the public brothels, he ordered all the rest to be scrambled for by his soldiers, and this before their fathers, husbands and brothers, and it is said no one murmured.

Ogotai died towards the close of 1241. For four years and more the Empire remained without a Supreme Ruler. During this time the widow of Ogotai acted as Regent. At last in 1246 a Kuriltai was held at which Kuyuk Khan, the eldest son of the Regent, was chosen Khakan, though this was not according to the wishes of Ogotai, who had desired that one of his grandsons should succeed him. At this Kuriltai were two Monks, sent from the Pope and the Council of Lyons to convert the Mongols, and it is from one of them, that we have an account of what happened during it. The Mongols were great drinkers, and though the morning was given up to business, the afternoon was spent in drinking. Kuyuk Khan, according to the usual custom in such cases amongst the Mongols, originally affected coyness, but at last consented to become the Khakan, upon which he and his wife were placed in a piece of black felt, raised aloft and declared Rulers. On this being done* "the members of the assembly prostrated themselves nine times" and "the vast multitude outside at the same time beat their foreheads to the ground. Kuyuk and his followers then went and did obeisance three times to the sun.

Mongol conquests in Syria and Asia Minor proceeded apace. Chief after Chief submitted. It is curious to find that in the Sultan of Iconium's army, fighting against the Mongols, there were a body of Christian Mercenaries. This was at a time not more than sixty years after Saladin's and Richard Cœur de Lion's wars and before Louis the IX's Crusade to Tunis.

These men in 1247 A. D. reached the Camp of Baichu, the Mongol General in Syria. Their ignorance of the name of the Khakan and their unwillingness to worship his Lieutenant, as well as the high claims they put forward for the Pope, irritated Baichu and they narrowly escaped being executed. Still from all we read, at one time it seemed to hang in the balance as to whether the Mongols would become Christians or Musulmans. The reasons, which made the greater part of them Muhammedans and not Christians, were chiefly the degraded state of the Christians with whom they had most to do, i.e., the Nestorians ; their greater proximity to Muhammedan races and the greater civilisation which they found amongst these ; and lastly, the fact that Islam allows, and Christianity does not, polygamy. It is well known that this last reason is a great hindrance to the spread of Christianity in Africa. General Gordon is said to have remarked that if he could have allowed his converts a plurality of wives, he would have been able to christianise that continent.

---

* Howorth, Vol. I., p. 163.

The Monks' letters were addressed not to the Khakan by name, but simply to the Chief of the Mongols. This was one of the reasons that irritated Baichu : "Does not your Master know," it was asked, "that the Khan is the son of God, that Baichu Niyan is his Lieutenant ; their names ought to have been known everywhere." The Mongol General's followers then ordered the Members of the Mission to honour Baichu with three genuflections. This they refused to do, saying, they were prepared to pay him the same honour that they showed their own Master. The retort was sharp,* "You who adore wood and stones ought not to refuse to adore Baichu Niyan, to whom the Khakan, the son of God, has ordered that the same honours are to be paid as to himself." At length the Mission was sent back with two letters, one from the Khakan to Baichu, called by the Mongols the letter of God, and the other from Baichu to the Pope. Both bear quoting—The first runs thus : "By the order of the living God, Chinghiz Khan, the son of God, the gentle and venerable. The Great God is lord over everything and on earth Chinghiz Khan† is alone Master. We would have this known in all our provinces, obedient or otherwise. It behoves thee, therefore, O Baiothuir (meaning probably Baichu) to let it be known by them that this is the will of the living God. And let this be known everywhere where an Envoy can go, that whoever disobeys you shall be driven out, and his land shall be laid waste. And I declare to you that whoever does not hear this my command must be deaf, and whoever † Chinghiz was dead at the time but his successors were supposed to be incarnate with his spirit.

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 168.

sees it and does not carry it out must be halt. This, my order, will reach everyone, wise and ignorant. Whosoever, therefore, hears and neglects to obey it shall be destroyed, lost, and killed. Make this known therefore O Baiothuir, and whoever obeys, wishing to save his house, and undertakes to serve us, shall be saved and treated honourably; and whoever shall oppose it, do according to your will and destroy him." The second letter ran thus: "By order of the divine Khan, Baichu Niyan sends these words: Pope, do you know that your Envoys have been to us and have brought us your letters? Your Envoys have spoken big words. We know not whether this was by your orders or at their instance. In your letters it is written, 'You have slaughtered and destroyed.' But this is the command of God, who rules the earth to us, 'whoever hears my words shall retain his land, water, and patrimony; but those who disobey are destroyed and lost.' We accordingly send you this message. If you, Pope wish to retain your patrimony, you must come to us in person, and present yourself before the master of the world. If you disobey, we know not what will happen; God knows. Before you come it will be well to send messengers to say whether you mean to come or no, and whether you mean to be friendly or otherwise."

Confusion followed on the death of Kuyuk Khan. The final result being that Mangu Khan, who was not of the house of Ogotai, became the Khakan, 1251-1252. Before he had become Khakan, Transoxiana had recovered to a large extent from the ruin in which Chinghiz Khan had plunged it, but Persia was still in a most desolate state. We read that whereas in China and Transoxiana the poorest could pay a gold piece as tribute, in Persia the minimum had to be reduced to one dinar and the maximum to seven. From one of the Monks already mentioned Rubruquis, who was present at the Kuriltai where Kuyuk Khan was elected, we learn much about Mangu's Court. At their first meeting he and his colleague found the Khakan with his wife and daughter sitting in a tent, hung with golden tissue and warmed by a chafing dish, in which were burnt thorns and roots of wormwood, the fire being made of dried dung. Drink was handed round, of which the Monks according to Rubruquis' story partook in moderation, but both the interpreter and the Khakan got drunk. Mangu was, however, gracious to the Monks, and gave them liberty to remain two months and go to the Mongol Chief city Karakorum. This city, of which the site is uncertain, was at this time very flourishing. Probably its site is not far from the northern boundary of the Gobi Desert. Mangu and his family, like Chenghiz, before them, were eclectics in religion. They took part equally in Christian (of the Nestorian form), Muhammedan and Buddhist services, in order to make sure of the blessings promised by each of these forms of religion. Howorth describes the Christian service as then performed at Mongol head-quarters.* "On one feast day Mangu's chief wife with her children entered the Nestorian Chapel, kissed the right hand of the Saints, and then gave her right hand to be kissed according to the fashion of the Nestorians. Mangu was also present, and with his spouse sat down on a gilt throne before the altar, and made Rubruquis and his companion sing; they chanted the Veni Sancte Spiritus. The Emperor soon after returned, but his wife stayed behind and gave presents to the Christians. Terasine, Wine and Kurmis were then brought in; she took a cup, knelt down, demanded a blessing, and while she drank the priests chanted; they then drank until they were drunk. Thus they passed the day, and towards the evening the Empress was drunk like the rest. She went home in a carriage escorted by the priests, who continued chanting and howling." Further on, he says, "The Nestorian notion of Christian worship was to place a cross on a piece of new silk on an elevated place, and then to prostrate before it."

It was in this reign that the famous sect of the Ismailiyas or Assassins was practically exterminated. This sect took its name from Ismail, whom they, originally a sub-sect of the Shiah, considered as the seventh Imam. They became quite a power in the East by the completeness of their secret organization and their implicit obedience to their Chief. Readers of Sir Walter

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 190.

Scott's Talisman will remember them as described in that book. Their head-quarters were in Kohistan in the North of Persia. Khulagu, or Hulagu as he is commonly known, Mangu's relation and general, swept through this country, destroying the forts and massacring the inhabitants, and his work was complete. From that day onwards the Assassins ceased to be a power in Eastern history.

Hulagu then marched against Baghdad. For almost five centuries this had been the capital of the Caliphs, the successors of the Prophet. Their power was not what it had been in the palmy early days of Muhammedanism, when the larger part of the Eastern world paid obedience to the spiritual head of Islam. The days of Harun Al Rashid had gone and gone for ever. But still the Caliphate was a great spiritual power. We know how even in these latter days, the claim of the Sultan of Constantinople to be the Caliph has much force in the Mussulman world; still more effective was then the claim of one, whom no orthodox Sunni could deny was really the Caliph, by strict apostolic succession from Abu Bakr, the First Caliph himself. But great as was his spiritual power the sword of the flesh was lamentably wanting to him. Many of the Muhammedan princes had already succumbed to the Mongols; others were far distant. Muhammedan Sectaries, and Muhammedanism has as many sects as Protestantism, were all hostile to him, and when the day of trial came, he was forced to meet it with forces from the country, where the Caliph's temporary power (to use the present day expression concerning the Papacy) still existed, i.e., the country immediately round Baghdad. When to this, it is added that there was treachery amongst his advisers, it can easily be seen how ill-prepared was the Caliph to meet the all-victorious Mongols. On they came like a flood, the Syrian army joining with that of Hulagu. On his way the latter hung an astrologer who was rash enough to predict that if the Mongols advanced on a certain day the sun would not rise, and that there would be on that day great convulsions of nature. Our prophet had not learnt the lesson, which our present day would-be astrologers and the like have learnt so well, the blessedness of being indefinite. On the other hand, he was definite, definite to a day, but unfortunately he was wrong, and to be wrong in such a matter could lead a prophet with a race like the Mongols, to only one place, the gallows. Divination from burnt sheep bones suited this people much better than predictions from star gazing; both methods being equally efficacious or inefficacious. After some fighting, not of a very serious nature, the Mongols stormed the Eastern walls of the city. Thereupon deputations came to Hulagu; the first being led by two of the Caliph's advisers. Hulagu insisted that their forces should come with them. When they came, he had them all put to death. Then out poured the Caliph and his principal grandees to the conqueror's camp. They were followed by a large multitude of people, who were massacred on issuing from the gates. The Mongols walked in and the sack of Baghdad commenced. Since its choice as the capital of the Caliphate, no foreign enemy had passed its gates. Its warehouses were full of merchandise from the four corners of heaven. Its treasuries were full of gold and precious stones. On everything the wild Mongols laid their hands. Rome, when sacked by Genseric, had already had an enemy several times plundering it, before the last and complete sack came. On Baghdad the fulness of wrath came in one day. Eight hundred thousand persons are said to have perished. Whether the Caliph was starved to death, or whether he was tied up and then rolled and trodden to death is uncertain. Certain it is that he did not survive the fate of the city, and that with his death, the apostolic succession of orthodox Muhammedan successors to the Prophet came to an end. On the Friday following the sack, the preacher for the day in place of the prayer for the Caliph uttered these words:— "Praise be to God, who has destroyed by death great beings and has condemned to destruction the inhabitants of this place;" and then ended: * "O, my God, help us in our calamity, unto which Islam and its children have not felt their equal. But we come from God and to God we return." He, who could utter on such an occasion such a prayer, showed that the root of Islam, the submission to God's will at all times, everywhere, was with him.

---

† Howorth, Vol. I, p. 202.

Hulagu had an Observatory built at Baghdad. His Astronomer, Vasiruddin, called the astronomical tables of China as well as the Western tables to his assistance. In ancient days when Rome and Athens were not, Babylon is supposed by some of our savants to have been the centre from which civilisation, or at least the art of making calculations concerning the heavens, stretched to China on the one hand, and Egypt on the other. Now, again, at Baghdad, near ancient Babylon, from China in the East as well as from the Ptolemaic tables of the West, do we find aid for the oldest and most universal of the sciences.

After Baghdad came the towns of Syria. The Mongols had protected the Shiah in Mesopotamia, and during the plunder of Baghdad especial troops were sent to protect the tomb of Ali at Kerbela. Howorth records at length the letters written at the Khakan's orders to the Sunni ruler of Syria Nasir, and his reply. Both are as scornful as letters can well be. Both are studded with phrases from the Koran. The Mongol repeats the old story of Chinghiz, that God had created the Mongols in his wrath, that when once in motion they were neither touched by tears nor moved by entreaty, and ends up with the ominous phrase "Safety to him who follows the path of safety." The Sunni's reply was, as far as words go, crushing. He begins by saying that the Mongol confesses his greatest infamy, that he is a devil and not a man. He continues by laughing the threats to scorn. "Obedience to God implies resistance to you. If we kill you, our duty will be done. If we are killed, paradise awaits us. Here is our answer; the commandment of God shall be fulfilled; do not hasten it. The prince Nasir Seifud Dinlu Yagmur, Aba Uddin el Kaimeri and the other chiefs and warriors of Syria, they do not refuse the challenge; they await impatiently the neighing of the horses and the charge of the warriors, for they have sworn to meet you. We await you, God grant the victory to whom he will. We shall not scatter diamond words, but we say what comes to our lips, and we excuse him who stammers." Brave words; but the Mongols were too strong for their opponents. They poured into Asia Minor and Syria, took many of the chief towns, including Aleppo and Damascus, massacring as usual as they went along, and it was only the death of the Khakan Mangu, which turned Hulagu eastwards, that kept him from Jerusalem itself. One of his Generals, Kitubuka, who commanded at Damascus after it was taken, was a Christian, and we read "that he very much favoured the Christians, who began to be very independent in their manners towards their recent Masters, the Mussulmans. They publicly drank wine even in the great fast of Ramzan,* they sprinkled with holy water the dress of the Muhammedans and doors of their Mosques; they made the followers of the prophet stoop to the cross in their processions; they sang psalms in the street, and proclaimed that their faith was the only true faith, and even destroyed mosques and minarets in the neighbourhood of their churches.

Mangu the Khakan, whose death took Hulagu eastwards, died during a Chinese campaign. The religion of the Mongols was still mainly Shamanism. Many Nestorians were in his Court, but they were little better than the Shamans, as regards superstitious practices.

Howorth has stories concerning the Shamans, of which I extract one. "One of the princesses having received a rich present of furs, these were purified by fire. According to custom the Shamans had retained a portion. One of the waiting women thought they had kept too much and told her mistress, who was very wrath with them. Some time after, the latter fell ill and the Shamans† revenged themselves by declaring she had been bewitched by the maid who denounced the theft. She was seized and subjected to torture for seven days. Meanwhile the princess died. The accused maid then begged they would kill her too, saying she wished to follow her mistress to whom she had done no wrong; but the Khakan would not consent, and she was set at liberty. The Shamans then chose another victim. They accused the nurse of her child, of having killed the princess. The nurse was the wife of one of the principal Nestorian preachers. Put to torture, she confessed that she had never done her any harm. She was nevertheless condemned to death and executed. Some time after one of Mangu's wives having given birth to a son, the Shamans who drew his horoscope predicted a long life for him and that he would become a great and prosperous Monarch. The prince dying in a few days, his mother summoned and severely reproached the Shamans. They excused themselves by laying the blame on the magical arts of the nurse who had been put to death. The princess was furious and wished to wreak her vengeance on her children. She had left a son and a daughter, and orders were given that the former should be killed by a man and the latter by a woman. Mangu was much annoyed by these executions ; he ordered his wife to be imprisoned for seven days, and then banished from the court for a month. He also ordered that the man should be executed, who had killed the boy, and that his head should be suspended about the neck of the woman who had killed the girl. She was then beaten with hot firebrands and put to death.

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 210.

† Howorth, Vol. I, p. 215.

Mangu's death was unexpected. The Mongols did not elect a Khan till after the death of the reigning sovereign, and hence in a vast Empire such as there had become, there was every opportunity for confusion to raise itself during an interregnum. Arikbuka, who was at Karakorum, called a Kuriltai to meet there. To this Khubilai Khan, the royal prince who was commanding in China, declined to come. He held a Kuriltai in China and had himself elected Khakan. With him begins a new epoch in Asiatic History. The breaking up of the Mongol power then began. One section of the Mongol princes became Emperors of China ; the others little by little sank to the position of Central Asian Princelets. Khubilai Khan is Coleridge's Kubla Khan, he who did a stately pleasure dome decree—

Where Alph, the river ran,
By caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.

He commenced his reign by a war against Arikbuka. Him, after a long struggle he subdued, but he had to meet another rival in Kaidu, the representative of the house of Ogotai. The latter held his own in the Highlands of Central Asia. Khubilai evidently preferred his new Empire of China to the barren home of his ancestors. Both the rivals reigned long. Mangu had died about 1260. Khubilai survived to 1294, Kaidu to 1301. Christians were still prominent in Kaidu's camp, and we find the cross as the standard of one of his chiefs in one of his campaigns. The chroniclers of Kaidu mention the kettledrums, afterwards so well-known in India as the token of the presence of royalty. Marco Polo describes Mongol warfare : * "The practice of the Tartars in going to battle is to take each a bow and sixty arrows ; of these thirty are with small points for long shots and following up an enemy, while the other thirty are heavy with broad heads, which they shoot at close quarters, and with which they inflict great gashes on the face and arms and cut the enemy's bow strings and commit great havoc. This every one is ordered to attend to, and when they have shot away their arrows, they take to their swords and maces and lances, which they also ply stoutly." A story concerning Kaidu's daughter is too characteristic of the Mongols, as they were, when still the children of the steppes, to be passed over here. This daughter was famous for her prowess in wrestling. She sent her challenges far and wide, offering to marry any man who could throw her, but, on the other hand, the man, if thrown by her, would have to pay her a hundred horses. In this way she had won ten thousand horses. A prince renowned at his home for his skill in wrestling, came from a far country to try his fortune. The woman's parents tried to persuade her to allow herself to be thrown ; this, however, she would not do. The wrestling match came off—she clad in a jerkin of sarcenet, and he in one of sandal—and the result was the defeat of the prince, who was thrown on his back on the palace pavement after a prolonged struggle, and his return unmarried to his home.

---

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 176.

In Khubilai's reign the Mongol Court became officially Buddhist. The Buddhist priests were named by the Mongols, Lamas, and one of them called Mati Dhwadsha was made by Khubilai, the Grand Lama, and also the Temporal Sovereign of Thibet. Thus originated the Grand Dalai Lama. Mati Dhwadhsha abovementioned constructed a new alphabet for the Mongols, who had hitherto used the Chinese or Uighar language.

Khubilai's conquests extended as far as Yunan and Burmah. Long before the Mongols came to India, they had conquered the greater part of Burmah. Howorth tells us that they were stopped at Prome by the want of provisions. The Khakan Khubilai caused many expeditions to be made by sea, but success was by no means uniform. Against the Japanese he was totally unsuccessful. It was during his reign that Marco Polo travelled in the East, and it is from this traveller that a very large part of our information concerning the Khakan is derived. The races in the Eastern part of the Empire, mainly the Chinese, were disgusted by the number of Western Christians, Muhammedans and Buddhists put over them, and much discontent, sometimes bursting out into open rebellion, was the result. As to Khubilai's Empire, Howorth says :* "Khubilai was the Sovereign of the largest Empire that was ever controlled by one man. China, Corea, Thibet, Tonkin, Cochin China, a great portion of India beyond the Ganges, the Turkish and Siberian realms from the Eastern Sea to the Dnieper, obeyed his commands ; and although the chiefs of the Hordes of Jagatai and Ogotai refused to acknowledge him, the Ilkhans of Persia (whose Empire bordered on the Mediterranean) and the Greek Empire were his feudatories ; in fact, D'Ohsson says, nearly all Asia was subject to him. This was in different ways. Thus, while the great Khanates of the Ilkhan and the Golden Horde owed him allegiance, probably sent him large quantities of riches as tribute, and while their chiefs received investiture at his hands, their internal government was controlled entirely by their special rulers. At first they were an integral part of the Empire, then they became substantially independent rulers, owning only a mediate allegiance to the Central Imperial authority. This was no doubt immense so long as the Mongol Imperial family was united; but with the rebellions of Arikbuka and Kaidu, and with the removal of the capital from Karakorum to China, it became weaker, until in a few reigns later it snapped altogether. The Supreme Khan had immediate authority only in Mongolia and China."

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 252.

The post service of the Mongols, which was subsequently introduced by them into India, is described by Marco Polo: "Pekin was the focus where there met many roads; along each of these roads, at intervals of from five and twenty to thirty miles, were situated post-houses or hostelries, splendidly furnished, called by the Mongols Yambs. To some of these hostelries were attached four hundred horses, 200 in use and 200 not. At others there were fewer. Where the messengers had to pass through roadless tracts, where neither house nor hostel existed, still there the station houses had been established, except that the intervals were greater, and the day's journey was fixed at thirty-five to forty-five, instead of twenty-five to thirty miles. Three hundred thousand horses were employed in this service and there were one thousand stations. There were two kinds of State messengers, the foot and horse couriers; both wore broad belts with bells attached, and were stationed at intervals of three miles. The bells sounded the courier's arrival, and prepared a fresh man to take his place, and Polo says, that by this means news travelled a ten days' journey in a day and a night, and the Khakan could eat fruit that had only been gathered twenty-four hours before, at a distance of ten days' journey. The horse couriers by the same system of relief did from 400 to 500 miles a day. The postmen takes a horse from those at the station, which were standing ready, saddled, all fresh and in wind, and mounts and goes at full speed, as hard as he can ride, and when those at the next post hear the bells, they get ready another horse and a man, equipped in the same way, and he takes over the letter or whatever it be, and is off full speed to the third station, where again a fresh horse is found all ready, and so the despatch speeds along from post to post, always at full gallop, with regular changes of horses, and the speed at which they go is marvellous. By night, however, they cannot go so fast as by day, because they have to be accompanied by footmen with torches, who could not keep up with them at full speed. These men are highly prized, and in order to keep up they have to bind their stomachs, chests and heads with strong bands, and each of them carried with him a gerfalcon tablet, in sign that he is bound on urgent express, so that if his horse breaks down on the road, or he has any other mishap, he can appropriate that of any traveller he meets, and make him dismount."

* Howorth, Vol. I, p. 257.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MONGOLS IN THE WEST.

WHILE the imperial title was given to the Mongol ruler who reigned in Karakorum and then in China, almost totally independent Mongols ruled in the West. After the capture of Baghdad, Hulagu's descendants, known as the Ilkans, rose to supreme power in Persia; the rule of the Mongol conquerors of Hungary and Russia, the chief tribe of which was known as the Golden Horde, extended over most of modern European Russia and round the Caspian Sea, while the race of Chagatai reigned in what is nowadays known as Turkistan. The Mongols proper in the most restricted sense of the term were only a small part of the hordes which had taken possession of Western Asia. Howorth suggests that the general name of Tartar might be given to them. But Tartar or Mongol, as I have already explained, the race is clearly enough marked out. The Nomad of Central and Eastern Asia is distinct from all the races to be found on every side of his home. Howorth discourses on his position in Russia thus :

* " In order to realise the kind of authority which Batu exercised, we must think of him not as the Sovereign of a settled community, ruling over cities and agriculturists with fixed settlements, but as the leader of a great Nomadic host, whose herds required large prairie lands to feed them, and who moved about as the exigencies of these herds demanded. We still have in miniature among the Kalmuks and Kazaks, conditions which answer to this description. In the greater part of Russia proper in the thirteenth century, almost all the country, in fact, which had been occupied and settled by Slavic settlers whose Kernel is known to us as Great Russia was in every way unsuited to the life of a Nomadic race. For the most part covered with wood and morass, the towns were mere clearances in the forest, and were separated from one another by wide stretches of forest and bog. Such land as had been reclaimed was under the plough and was not grass land. This offered few temptations to invaders to settle in, especially as the climate was harsh and severe. This great Kernel of Central Russia, however, was bounded on the South and South-East by a very different kind of land. There were huge flat plains covered with juicy grasses. The excellence of the pastures of these plains is best proved by their being the home of the famous herd of Ukraine cattle, the famous fat tailed sheep and the hardy Cossack horses. There were no interminable forests or quagmires, no boundaries or limits. The steppes or pampas were in effect a very paradise for a Nomadic race and have, from the earliest recorded history, been the homes of tribes of Scyths, Huns, Turks and Kalmuks. Here then the Tartar conquerors settled down. The vast prairies which stretch from the Carpathians to the Balkash Sea are threaded by some famous rivers, and it was on these rivers that the main encampments of the Tartars were fixed. Batu himself settled down on the Volga, which waters probably the finest pasture lands in the world, while other and subordinate hordes were settled on the Yaikor Ural, the Don and Dnieper. As was the universal habit in these districts, there was an annual migration up and down the river. In summer the camp was fixed on the North, and as winter came on there was a general movement further South. Except in winter there was probably little actual halting. During that season a more permanent camp was formed, which as civilisation overtook the Tartars, took the form of a small city. The camp was gathered round the chief's golden tent or Sira Ordu, whence the whole encampment and from it the whole race took its name of the Golden Horde. This golden tent was styled a Serai, palace, and what was once but a magnificent Yurt, became the nucleus of a considerable town, and is well known as Serai, the capital of the Golden Horde."

---

* Howorth, Vol. II, p. 66.

"It was fortunate indeed for Russia, and probably also for Europe, that the Tartars thus planted themselves without its borders and did not, as in Persia and China, actually occupy the land itself and become incorporated with the natives. As Karanzin says, if they had done so, Russia might still have been a Mongol possession. In other places a fertile soil and a genial climate won the Nomads eventually to settled habits. The hard conditions of life in Russia repelled the Invaders, who remained perforce, Nomads occupying only the grass steppes where the Comans formerly dwelt, and gradually becoming enervated in these border districts still occupied at a much later day not by Slaves but by Finnic races." As far as the remarks of Howorth may be applied to India, we will see how Captive India conquered its conquerors and how the final result of the Moghul conquests of Baber and Akbar was not India becoming a Mongol possession, so much as the Mongol being changed and converted into an Indian. The hand was subdued to the dye in which it worked.

The Mongol in his native home, as I have already said, was a Shamanist. In the East he fell under the influence of the Lamas and Confucius. In the West Muhammedanism made him his own. The change, as all great religious changes are, was slow. Though the race soon became Muhammedan in name, the old magic and devil worship died hard. With other races Muhammedanism has had a binding influence. With the Mongols it helped to disintegrate the over-sized Empire, hastening the breaking up of Chenghiz Khan's Empire. Probably nothing would have held this together. It had grown fast; its military exploits had far outstripped its administrative capacities.

Such Empires, as ancient history teaches, never last long. Assyria, Chaldea, Persia are all instances of rapid growth and decay. Even Alexander's Empire, though the road had long been prepared by the Hellenism of at least a part of the nearer East, did not long survive entire, and the Eastern portion, where Hellenism had taken no firm hold previous to the Macedonian conquests, speedily reverted to its former state and retained but the slightest marks of Grecian conquest and influence. It is only in cases such as ancient Rome, and I may say Modern Britain where conquest has never far outstripped administration that Empires abide. Bereke of the Golden Horde was the first Muhammedan Mongol Ruler. Howorth as to this says :—* "I believe that although the Mongol Empire must inevitably have fallen to pieces from its size and unwieldiness, yet the immediate cause of its collapse was the conversion of the Western Khanates to Muhammedanism, and the consequent raising of a very powerful barrier between them and the Eastern Supreme authorities." And again he writes : † "This conversion (to Islam) was a very serious matter in other ways. It commenced a process of disintegration in consequence of which it was found impossible presently to keep up even a formal obedience to the Great Khan. Islam is too proud a faith to yoke itself at the Chariot wheels of peaceful Buddha or the Fetishism of the Shamans." As to the civilising power of Muhammedanism, Howorth goes on to say, "Muhammedanism is further, as we know in numberless other cases, a great civilising power among semi-barbarous races. We shall find that from this date, however well the Tartars of the Russian steppes kept up their renown for martial virtue, that they ceased to be the ferocious creatures they were but a generation before, when they desolated Khorassan, while they became by accepting the law of the Prophet an important factor in the world of nations who were bound together by the freemasonry of the Crescent." These words seem written in irony when we read of the massacres directed or permitted by Taimur a good century and more after Bereke's conversion. Taimur was an orthodox Muhammedan, but between him and Chinghiz Khan there is not much to choose as far as cruelty and disregard for human life are concerned.

* Howorth, Vol. II, p. 105.

† Howorth, Vol. II, p. 125.

By 1315 A. D. Uzbek Khan, whose name was given to one of the Turkish clans, was able to say in a letter to the Sultan of Egypt that in his Empire, i.e., that of the Golden Horde, there were only now Muhammedans. In Persia the Ilkhan Ghazan, whom more hereafter, had formally declared himself a Muhammedan in 1295 A. D. A curious custom is mentioned by the Chinese traveller Ibn Batuta which shows that the Mongols did not forget their old habits of governing by the lash even when they became Muhammedans. * "When any one absented himself from the place in the Mosque at Khwarism, he was beaten by the priest in the presence of the congregation and fined 5 dinars which went towards the repair of the mosque. Each mosque was provided with a whip for the purpose."

In the middle of the fourteenth century the Black Plague twice devastated the Mongol territories. Howorth suggests it may have come from China. He says: "It seems to have originated in China where 13,000,000 people became its victims. Thence it spread over the Mongol world. The country on both sides of the Caspian was devastated by it, Khwarism, Turkestan, Serai all fell under its influence. The Armenians, Abkhazians, and Circassians, the Jews, the Genoese and the Venetian Colonists in the Krim were decimated. It also swept over Greece, Syria and Egypt. The Genoese ships carried it to Italy, France, England and Germany. Fifty thousand people, says Karamzin, were buried in one cemetery in London. At Paris the distracted people wished to exterminate the Jews, whom they charged with having introduced it. In 1349 A. D. it appeared in Scandinavia and thence passed to Pskof and Novigorod. One-third of the inhabitants of Pskof perished. Each priest found as many as thirty bodies daily for burial in his church, and the service for the dead was performed for them en masse. The cemeteries were full, the bodies were buried beyond the walls and in the forests. The contagion was so dangerous that even the rich could not find nurses. Children fled from their parents, and the despairing people devoted their wealth to the service of religion. Winter put an end to the plague. It seems to have been a violent dysentery or cholera, and was marked by an effusion of blood, after which the victims lived two or three days. Its effects among the Nomads were doubtless terrible. Such diseases when they attack strong hearty people, for the most part flesh-eaters, are singularly fatal, and the history of the spread of such scourges as small-pox, measles, &c., in Siberia and North America is a grim story.* And again in the same year 1365 "Russia was again ravaged by plague. This terrible scourge is described in graphic terms by the Annalists." "The victims were suddenly struck," says the Chronicler, "as with a knife at the breast, at the shoulder-blade, or between the shoulders; a devouring fire consumed the entrails, blood flowed at the mouth, a burning fever succeeded by a shivering cold, tumours appeared in the neck, the hips, under the arms, or behind the shoulder-blade. The issue was always the same inevitable death, swift but terrible. Out of each hundred persons but ten remained well. The dead were buried seven or eight together in the same grave, and whole houses were stripped of their inhabitants."

* Howorth, Part II, p. 167.

The Golden Horde, from whose other name Kipchak is derived the modern Cossacks met its decisive overthrow at the hands of Taimur. In a fight in 1391 at Kandurcha, far North in the land of the Bulghurs, they were totally overthrown. Of this fight, Howorth writes:† "This battle and its consequences were a fatal blow to the Golden Horde from which it never recovered. Its population was so terribly decimated and its towns so ravaged and destroyed, that its glory may be fairly said to have passed away. We, who are accustomed to a temperate clime and a rich soil, cannot realize the terrible task of building up a stable and prosperous civilisation, where climate and soil are both harsh, where the desert and its robber tribes are close at hand, where the inhabitants are only half reclaimed Nomads themselves and where civilisation is not a home grown plant, but an exotic which grows only under constant care and with prosperous surroundings. Such was the civilisation on the Volga, which the terrible vengeance of Taimur trod under. We cannot say that he was not provoked, but it makes us shudder to think, how under such conditions the ruin and misery of large nations may be entirely at the mercy of intemperate and wayward rulers, whose one false step may sweep away what centuries has accumulated. Taimur negatively may be deemed one of the founders of Modern Russia, for he destroyed the great power which might have held Russia in check.

* Howorth, Vol. II, p. 205.

† Part II, Div. I, 247.

On the ruin of the Golden Horde, the Uzbegs became the dominant power in the lands, East of the Caspian, known now by the name of Turkestan. Khwarism, better known as Khiva, was their main centre. They had much to do, as we shall see hereafter with Baber, the first of the Great Moghuls, whose deadly enemies they were. Though Muhammedans for a long period, we find that they still retained old Shaman superstitions, such as incantations for rain. To prove that belief in Islam did not change their savage nature, I would point, though this is beyond the strict limits of this book to the story of their taking Meshed in A. D. 1505. This capture, which marked the culminating point of Uzbek rule, shows to us how after all Uzbegs, though they had come under the harmonising influence of Muhammedanism, were still real descendants of the old Mongols, though it is but fair to say that religious bigotry joined itself to pure savagery, the Uzbegs being Sunnis, and Meshed a holy city of the Shiahhs. So it is probable that these Sunni conquerors, like the Spaniards in Flanders, thought they were doing God's service when they dashed the little ones against stones. Let us quote Howorth : * "When Abdoolmomin's troops entered the town they found that the inhabitants of both sexes, and the numerous learned men, had all congregated in the outer court of the shrine of Imam Riza, in the hope that they might be protected there by the sanctity of the spot; but the Uzbeks in their blind fury cut down and destroyed every thing that came in their way, even the supposed descendants of Imam Riza, who were clinging to the holy shrine of their ancestor. were there pitilessly massacred. It is said that Abdoolmomin himself looked on from the Court of Mir Ali Sher, whilst his soldiers were murdering children and old men, common people and learned philosophers indiscriminately, and that even the shrieks of a thousand victims and their dying groans were unavailing to move his pity. Not only the public streets but the holiest precincts of the mosque and the shrine itself were deluged with blood, and in the general sack of the town the grave of the Alim suffered more than most parts, costly offerings of pious pilgrims which had been accumulating there for three centuries, falling into the hands of conquerors. Amongst them were enormous massive gold and silver candelabra, whole suits of armour in precious metals, splendid single stones, buttons, studs and other articles of jewellery richly ornamented, and most valuable of all, the magnificent library with its celebrated copies of the Koran, marvels of the art of caligraphy, the gift of former Sultans; all these were dragged away, torn up and completely destroyed. The vengeance of the Sunni conquerors did not even spare the very dead, for the ashes of Tahmasp were torn from their grave by the side of Imam Riza's, and scattered to the winds with curses and execrations."

---

* Howorth, Vol. II, p 735.

The Georgian Chroniclers describe the Mongols who invaded their land under Ogotai, one of the sons of the Chinghiz in the most graphic terms. We quote two descriptions of them from Guiragos, a Georgian Chronicler.* "The swarms of Mongols who overran his country, he compares, to flights of locusts and drops of rain. He who had a sword, hid it for fear that if found upon him he might be pitilessly killed; children were broken to death upon the stones, and young maidens cruelly ravished. The Tartars had a hideous aspect and bowels without pity; they were insensible to mother's tears or to the white hairs of age, and they sped to carnage as to a wedding orgy. Everywhere were unburied corpses, the service of the church ceased, while the people preferred the night to the day. The advance of the invaders was insatiable, and what they could not take away they destroyed." And again, Howorth says, * "Guiragos describes the Mongols as having horrible and repulsive countenances, and as being (except in the case of a few who had a little) without beards. On the upper lip and chin were a few hairs, which might be counted. They had small piercing eyes, and shrill piercing voice. They were long lived. So long as they had abundant food, they ate and drank gluttonously, and when this was scarce, they as easily supported hunger. They fed on the flesh of all kinds of animals pure and impure, but preferred that of the horse. They cut the animals into quarters, and then boiled or roasted them without salt. They cut them into small pieces, and having dipped them in saltwater, ate them. Some knelt while eating, like camels, while others sat down. Masters and servants had equal shares at their feasts. In drinking kurmis or wine, a large vessel was produced, out of which a man took out a portion in a cup, and threw some of it towards the sky and towards the four points of the compass. After having tasted the libation, the cup-bearer handed some of it to the principal chiefs, who to prevent themselves being poisoned, made the person who carried it taste any meat or drink he offered. They had as many wives as they pleased and punished adultery mercilessly with death. They punished theft in the same way. Guiragos says, they had no religion and no religious ceremonies, although they had name of God on their lips on all occasions. They often declared that their ruler was the equal of God, who had taken heaven himself, while he had given the earth to the Khakan, and to prove it, declared that Chenghiz Khan had not been produced in the ordinary way, but that a ray of light, coming from some invisible place, had entered by the roof into the house of his mother and had said, " 'Conceive and thou shalt have a son who will be ruler of this world.' When a Tartar died or was put to death, they carried his corpse about with them for several days, since they believed that a demon entered the body, and made a number of statements, they then burnt it. Sometimes also they buried it in a deep grave, with its arms and apparel, and the gold and silver belonging to the deceased. If he was a chief, they also buried some of his male and female slaves, that they might wait on him, and also some horses, since they believed there were great fights in the other world. In order to perpetuate the memory of the deceased, they slit open the belly of his horse, and took out all the flesh through the opening. They then burnt the bones and entrails, and afterwards sewed up the skin as if its body was whole, and thrust a pole through it, which came out of its mouth. This memorial they hung upon a tree or in an elevated situation. Their women, he says, were magicians, and cast their incantations everywhere. It was only after a decision by their magicians that they undertook a march."

* Howorth, Vol. III, p. 25.

---

* Howorth, Vol. III, p 34.

It was of the Mongols about this time that we get a pleasing story. When the Byzantine Emperor sent them an Embassy with a large present of grand clothes and precious stones, they asked if clothes would prevent their wearers from growing weary at their work and if the jewels would ward off thunderbolts. In 1242, bands of Mongols entered into India and sacked Lahore. * "We are told that the feudal chief Malik Ikhtiyar Uddin Karakush was unprepared with either stores, provisions, or war materials, while the citizens were disunited. Most of them were traders, and had been in Khorasan and Turkistan, where they had obtained safe conducts, and were careless about the fate of the Malik Karakush. Meanwhile, the latter's feudal chief, Sultan Muizz Uddin Bahram Shah of Delhi, was at issue with his Turk and Ghori troops, and there was therefore some delay in sending assistance from Delhi. The Mongols proceeded to invest Lahore, and bombarded and destroyed its walls with a number of mangonels. The Malik Karakush feeling that from the disaffection and disunion inside it would not be possible to defend the city, made a sortie at night with his men, and cut his way through. Some of the harem and of his retinue got separated from him in the darkness, and in the tumult dismounted and hid away among the ruins and the graves. The following day the Mongols captured the place, conflicts arose in all directions. Two bands of Muhammedans in that disaster girded up their lives like their waists, and firmly grasped the sword, and up to the latest moment that a single pulsation remained in their dear bodies, and they could move, they continued to wield the sword and to send Mongols to hell, until the time when their bodies, after fighting gallantly for a long period against the infidels, attained the felicity of martyrdom, while among the latter a vast number perished, and we are told that there was not a person among them who did not bear the wounds of arrow, sword or nawak (some projectile is here meant).”* Two of the principal of these heroes were named Ak Sunkar, the Seneschal of Lahore, and Din Dar Mahommed, the Amir-i-Akhur of Lahore. The former is said to have had a single combat with the Mongol Commander, Tair, in which both were killed, “one company to heaven; one to the flaming fire.” “The capture of Lahore was followed by the usual massacre of the old and useless, and the taking capture of the young. Kutbuddin Hasan, the Ghorî who had been sent with an army from Delhi to the relief of the place, arrived too late, and after the Mongols, who had suffered great losses, retired. When he learnt of their retreat Karakush retraced his steps towards the river Biah, where in his flight he had hidden some treasure. This he recovered, and then went on to Lahore, where he put to death the Hindu Khokhars and the Gabrs who were committing destruction there.”

---

* Howorth, Vol. III, p. 69.

In 1246 A.D. the Mongols marched against Uchh, which place, however, they did not succeed in taking. We read “the place was bravely defended by its inhabitants. The breach was at length forced by a famous Baghatur, who led a storming party in the third watch, when the men on guard were reposing, and appeared on the top of the breach. The people inside, however, had prepared a great pit into which they had poured much clay and water, so that it was in fact a quagmire more than a spear's length in depth. Into this the storming party stumbled, whereupon the defenders raised a shout, brought out torches and armed themselves, and the attacking party withdrew. Their leader, however, had been suffocated in the slough. The Mongols outside thought he had been captured, and offered to retire if he was surrendered." They eventually returned without taking the place, a very unusual circumstance with them. This was on hearing that an army was advancing from Delhi to the rescue. Howorth sums up the position by saying, "the Mongols virtually remained masters of the country West of the Biah whence they seem to have made periodical raids into India.

---

* Howorth, Vol III, p. 70.

The earliest coin of the Mongols with Arabic inscriptions, says Mr. Stanley Poole, and probably their earliest with any inscription is that struck at Tiflis in 642 A. D.

The victorious career of the Mongols was checked by the Mameluk princes of Egypt. In September 1260 the Mongols under Kitubuka were totally routed by the Mameluk Sultan Kuttuz. Before war broke out Hulagu, the General of the Mongols in the West, had despatched to the Egyptian Ruler a letter written in the regular Mongol fashion. "You have heard, how we have conquered a vast Empire, how we have purified the earth of the disorders which have tainted it, and have slaughtered the greater part of its inhabitants. It is for you to fly and for us to pursue, and whether will you fly, and by what road shall you escape us? Our horses are very swift, our arrows sharp, our swords like thunderbolts, our hearts as hard as the mountains, our soldiers numerous as the sand. Fortresses will not detain us, nor arms stop us. Your prayers to heaven against us will not avail. You enrich yourselves by vile means and break the most solemn promises. Revolt and disobedience are in your midst. And you are about to receive a terrible punishment for your pride. Those who have been unjust are going to learn their fate. Those who dare to make war upon us are about to repent. Those who seek our protection will alone be safe. If you will submit to our orders and the conditions we impose, you shall share our fortune. If you resist you will perish. Do not commit suicide. He who has been warned ought to be on his guard. You are persuaded we are infidels, whilst we look upon you as criminals, and God, whose orders are irrevocable and whose decrees are perfectly just, has caused us to triumph over you. Your strongest forces are in our eyes mere small bands of men, and your most distinguished people we contemn. Your kings we despise. Do not delay long. Hasten to reply to us before war lights its fires and throws its sparks upon you, or you will find no refuge from the terrible catastrophe that will overwhelm you, and you will make a desert of your country. We mean well by our warning. It is to arouse you from your slumber. At present you are the only enemy against whom we have to march. May safety be with us and you and all those who follow the divine commands, who fear the issue of death, and submit to the orders of the supreme king. Say to Egypt,* "Hulagu is about to come, escorted by naked swords and sharp blades. He is going to humiliate the great ones of this land, and will send the children to join the old."

"The victory of the Egyptians was a turning point in the world's history. It was the first time that the Mongols had been fairly and completely beaten, and although the defeat was probably largely due to the smallness of their numbers, Kitubuka having apparently only 10,000 men with him, it was none the less decisive. It stopped the tide of Mongol aggression and probably saved Egypt, and in saving Egypt, saved the last refuge where the arts of the Mussalman world had taken shelter, where under the famous Mameluk dynasties, and under the new line of Khalifs, it blossomed over in wonderful luxuriance, and not only made Cairo the Cynosure of Eastern cities, but was eventually the means of distributing culture to the Golden Horde, and very largely also to the Empire of the Ilkhans itself."† Besides throwing back the Mongols in their conquering and devastating career, the successful stand of the Egyptians led to the centre of Muhammedan life being transferred from Baghdad to Egypt.

---

* Howorth, Vol. III, p. 165.

† Howorth, Vol. III, p. 169

In 1261 Bibers, who supplanted and succeeded Kuttuz in the Mameluk Sultanate, caused the uncle of the late Khalif to be enthroned as Caliph at Cairo, he taking from the new Khalif a grant of his kingdom. The glory of Islam left Baghdad never to return, and though the Cairene Khalifs were of little political importance in Muhammedan history (coins indeed in India are to be found stamped with their names in the latter half of the thirteenth century) still from this time we may date Cairo's being the intellectual head of Islam, a position it has ever lost. In all parts of the Muhammedan world the theological training given at the El Azhar Mosque at Cairo is considered the highest and most complete.

In one of the conflicts between Mongol and Egyptian we read of a prisoner being put to death by being wrapped in a fresh sheep skin, fastened tight around him and in this position exposed to the sun. This truly characteristic Mongol punishment was afterwards in common use amongst the Moghuls in India. Howorth tells us that Hulagu had a curious diplomatic intercourse with the rulers of Delhi. According to the Minhaj-i-Seraj, the Malik Nasir Uddin Muhammad, son of Hasan the Karluk, who held authority about Bamian, had sent secret Envoys to Ulugh Khan-i-Azam, the Sultan of Delhi's most valiant feudatory, for a marriage between their families. The latter sent a Khilji Turk named Hajib-i-Ajal (the most worthy chamberlain) Jamal Uddin with his answer. En route, he was detained at Multan and closely questioned by the Malik Iz Uddin Balban (who was then ruling with semi-independent power there) about his journey and the Mongol Shahnah or intendants. He was allowed to go on, and reached Bamian safely, but the news of his arrival having reached the Mongol Shahnah there, the Malik Nasir Uddin was forced to send him on to Hulagu to Irak and Azerbaijan, and in addition wrote letters and sent presents by him in the name of Ulugh Khan-i-Azam. They reached

Hulagu's presence at Tabriz. Hajib Ali was well received, and his letters were translated from Persian to Mongol. It was customary in writing letters to the inferior Mongol and other dependent chiefs to alter the usual designation of Khan, borne by many of the grandees of India and Sinde, to Malik, since Khan was among the Mongols a title of supreme dignity. We are told by our courtly author "that Hulagu having noticed this alteration in the case of Ulugh Khan-i-Azam, enjoined that in his case the title Khan should be used; a very improbable story. When Hajib returned, Hulagu ordered the Shahnah of Bamian who was a Mussulman to accompany him, and we are again told a questionable story, viz., that Hulagu sent orders to the Mongol troops under Sali Noyan, saying, 'If the hoof of a horse of your troops shall have entered the dominion of the Sultan of Sultans, Nasir Uddin Muhammad Shah (God perpetuate his reign), the command unto you is that all four feet of such horse be lopped off.' When Hulagu's Envoys arrived near the capital orders were given that they should be detained at Bamtah. After a while they were conducted to the capital to be presented to the Sultan, and a magnificent review of troops was held, when, according to Minhaj-i-Seraj, 200,000 foot soldiers and 50,000 horses, fully equipped, were present, and the imposing army was paraded in twenty lines of men one behind another, like the avenue of a pleasure garden with the branches entwined, placed shoulder to shoulder, row after row." This spectacle was doubtless arranged to create a feeling of respect on the part of the Mongols when they heard of it. There is a curious bit of local colour in the remark that some of the emissaries were thrown from their horses when the trumpeting elephants charged. The Envoys were conducted to the capital and received with the honours due to distinguished guests. They were conducted to the Kasri Sabz (Green Castle). The castle was decorated with various kinds of carpets and cushions, and a great number of rare articles of gold and silver, with two canopies, one red and the other black, adorned with costly jewels over the throne. The distinguished Maliks, Amirs, and Lords, &c., and the handsome young Turk slaves, with golden girdles, stood round about. On the throne sat the Sultan, "as a sun from the fourth heaven, with Ulugh Khan-i-Azam in attendance as a shining moon, kneeling upon the knee of veneration and reverence, the Maliks in rows like unto revolving planets, and the Turks in their gold gem-studded girdles like unto stars innumerable." The Minhaj-i-Seraj unfortunately closes narrative at this point, and we do not know what was the issue of the Embassy.

Christians and Muhammedans held very different opinions as to Hulagu. In the latter's eyes he was the cursed Chief of the Tartars; in the former he was the great and pious King. Like other Kings he was much influenced in these matters by one of his wives.

Mongol administration was much like Ottoman administration at the present day. Civil and military powers were strictly divided, and the direction of the finances was separated from the other functions of State.

The first of the Ilkhans of Persia who became a Muhammedan was Sultan Ahmed Khan, A.D. 1282. As in the case of the Golden Horde further north, little by little the Mongol conquerors became Muhammedans, but until Taimur's final overthrow of them, they retained much of their original superstitions.

One of the Mongol Ilkhans of Persia, Gaikathu Khan, in 1294 A.D., issued paper money. His money affairs had got into absolute confusion, and some ingenious person had suggested to him that by issuing unlimited paper money he should be able to set them right. The money was called chao, after the paper money issued in China. To keep the paper from being altered, death was threatened to the defacer, his wives and children and confiscation of goods. The use of a metal currency was prohibited. The result we give in the words of Howorth: \* "The first issue of chao took place at Tabriz on the 12th of September 1294, and it was accompanied by an edict declaring that whoever refused to accept, whoever bought or sold other money than chao, and whoever did not take his coin to the mint to be exchanged for paper money, was to be punished by death. This was shouted in the street by criers. The fear of punishment caused the order to be obeyed for eight days, but afterwards the shops and markets were deserted. Nothing was to be bought in the city and people began to leave. The famished citizens rushed to the neighbouring gardens to get fruit. Gaikathu one day traversed the bazaar and noticing that the shops were empty, enquired the reason why. The Vazir said that a great Magistrate was dead, and that it was customary with the citizens to leave the bazaar on such occasions. The authorities and troops had great difficulty in restraining the crowd. The Mussulmans met in their mosques on the Friday and broke out into lamentations. Presently open murmurs were heard, and imprecations were flung at Iz Uddin Muzaffer and the other authors of the innovation, and eventually attempts were made on the lives of the Vazir and his people. As at the time of the issuing of the French assignats or the American green backs prices became quite arbitrary, and Wassaf tells us how the sellers of a horse not worth more than  $7\frac{1}{2}$  gold pieces asked for 750 in paper. In the panic that ensued the Vazir's brother, Kutb Uddin, was compelled to sanction the purchase of provisions with coin and several were put to death for having taken part in the disturbances. The Vazir presently saw the ill-effects of his experiment. An ordinance permitting the use of coin in buying provisions was issued, and coin appeared again in other commercial affairs. Finally, the chao itself was suppressed amidst universal joy. For two months commercial dealings had virtually ceased, the shops were empty, the roads were deserted by traders, while artists and poets emulated each other in constructing lampoons and gibes at the expense of the paper money and its authors. Much money was wasted also in building the various mints, that at Shiraz having cost five golden tumans. In that town no one could sell a sheet of paper without the permission of the bank. Prince Ghazan did not wish the chao to be introduced into his appanage, and when the official arrived with the paper and material for its fabrication, he sent word to the Ilkhan that the air in that part of the country, especially in Mazenderan, was so damp that arms and armour could not resist it for twelve months, while a piece of paper when used became as fragile as a spider's web, and he ordered it all to be burnt."

---

* Howorth, Vol. III, p. 371.

Ghazan Khan, the last of the great Ilkhans of Persia, became a Muhammedan, while still a competitor to the throne in A. D. 1295. Formerly he had been a Buddhist. With him Mongol Persia may be said to have become Muhammedan. Before the Persians, the conquered race were Mussulmans, and the Mongols the conquerors, Buddhists or Pagans. With his succession came orders to destroy Buddhist monasteries and Christian churches. The Christians who had hitherto been the favourites of the Pagan Ilkhans and had not used their privileges over-wisely now experienced considerable persecution. Save in a very few remote parts Christianity completely disappeared in Persia. That Ghazan's Muhammedanism was not unmixed with considerable Paganism is clear from a story told in Howorth: * "Those who were present fastened various ribbons to the tree around which the Amirs danced. Ghazan was told that a former Mongol Chief, whose bravery had become proverbial, on his way to attack the Merekits dismounted before a tree on this route, and prayed to God fervently, undertaking if he were victorious to return and deck the tree with beautiful pieces of cloth. He did so return, and decked out the tree, while he and his troops danced round it, after returning thanks to the Eternal. This story delighted Ghazan, who said that if his ancestors had not been pious people they would not have become great Kings, and he himself joined in the dance."

When Ghazan became a Muhammedan he definitely broke off his alliance with the Supreme Khan in the furthest East. Hitherto the Ilkhans had been merely feudatories of the Khakan of Mongolia and China. They now became quite independent, and it is natural that the formulæ on the coins should accordingly be changed. On Ghazan's coins we find in Mongol characters the words, Teguiri Kuchunder Ghasanu Keguluksen. (By God's power Ghazan's coinage). In addition to this inscription there occur three characters which M. Terrien de la Coupine has shown to be in the Bashpa character, the first native form of character introduced among the Mongols, which was the invention of the Lama Bashpa, or Pakba, and was first introduced by Khubilai Khan in 1269. The three characters represent the words, 'Ma Kha son,' the first being a contraction for Mahmud, and the second and third forming the nearest approximation to Ghazan which the character was capable of representing. When the name occurs in Arabic letters it is written Ghazan Mahmud. Rashid-Uddin has reported many sayings of this wise King, some of which we may quote.* "He recommended his ministers and yargujis to beware of listening to the accusations brought against any governor or public officer. For it is possible, he said, that those complaining have been made to pay taxes which were not exacted previously, that they have lost some post, or have some other private grudge. In such cases it is better to consult public opinion, which is the best judge. Do the people like him or no? There are few functionaries who know how to conciliate the affections of the people, and who are inclined to justice. If an official has many good qualities and only a few faults, if, above all, he is not avaricious, if he be firm and loyal, it is not necessary to displace him."† "You wish," he one day said to his officers, "that I should let you pillage the Tajiks, but what will you do after you have destroyed the cattle and seeds of the labourer? If in such a case you should come to me asking for food, I would punish you. Remember, when you would strike or maltreat their women and children, how dear our own are to us, and that they are men like ourselves."

---

* Howorth, Vol. III, p. 464.

After Ghazan the Ilkhans had gradually decreased in power, their kingdom was split up in pieces, and within a very few years

* Howorth, Vol. III, p. 494.

† Howorth, Vol. III, p. 495.

Taimur, the second Chenghiz, put an end to them and with them to the Mongol rule of Persia. The Turkish domination over Persia, which started with him, lasted, however, barely a century. By the end of the fifteenth century Persia, after many centuries of foreign rule, was again governed by Native Kings.

CHAPTER IX.

THE MONGOLS OF THE EAST IN THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

WITHIN a hundred years after the death of Khubilai the Mongol dynasty in China came to an end. Its history was one so common in Oriental countries. License, intrigue, debauchery at the court, treachery and injustice outside; the gradual enfeebling of the ruling steppes; add to this that the history of the first half of the fourteenth century is full of natural disasters, earthquakes, famines, plague, and we can easily see why the Empire had nothing of permanency in it. The same causes were powerful in disintegrating the Moghul rule in the eighteenth century in India, where the same results ensued. In China, however, there was no outside white race to snatch the reins of power. A Chinese dynasty again reigned in China, and in that immoveable land it seemed as if all traces of foreign influence had been obliterated. Beyond ruin the Mongols had left naught else behind.

To the Indian reader the number of Indian names in Chinese history such as Dharmapala, Ananda, Ayuchelitala, Maitilapal are interesting as showing how strong Buddhist influence had become. Indeed one of the chief Chinese complaints was that Buddha was so much more honoured than Confucius. To European readers the notices of Christianity during these latter Mongol days in China is probably the one interesting part of Howorth's narrative. John of Monte Corvino was appointed Archbishop of Khanbaligh or Peking in 1307 A. D. For years before he had worked in the East. The Nestorians seem to have given him much trouble. This John seems to have been a man of much worth, and when he died in in 1328 we are told that both Pagans and Christians followed him to the grave with demonstrations of the deepest grief and veneration.

Later in 1342 legates from the Pope reached the last of the Mongol Emperors of China. They brought with them horses whose great size seems to have been much admired by the Chinese, accustomed only to the small ponies of Mongolia. This Emperor treated the Christian legates most generously; indeed, in those days a Muhammedan had much more to fear at the Mongol Court than a Christian.

A ghastly story, in which a Mongol ruler of the latter part of the fourteenth century took a chief part, shows how fierce the passions of the Mongols still were. We are told this Khan was out hunting one day and killed some hares. As their blood trickled out on the snow he exclaimed, "Give me a wife with a face as white as this snow and cheeks as crimson as this blood." Thereupon Chuchai Dadshua Uirat told the Khan that his (the Khan's) sister-in-law "surpasses this by far." The ordinary Eastern consequence followed. The brother was killed and the sister-in-law had against her will to enter her brother-in-law's harem. On a subsequent visit of the Uirat to Court, she called him to her apartment, as she wished to show him every courtesy. There she handed him a drugged bowl of wine which he drank and became unconscious. Thereupon she dishevelled her hair scratched herself in many places, raised a cry and told a servant to call the Khan. On his coming she accused the Uirat of having in a state of intoxication misused her and having reduced her to the state in which she was. The Uirat, who had recovered by this his senses, upon hearing this took to his horse. The Khan pursued; they fought; he shot at the Khakan and wounded his little finger, but was notwithstanding overpowered and killed. He was then flayed and his skin was taken home by the Khakan to show his wife. She was not satisfied with the sight only. "Let us try," she said, "how human hide tastes." Thereupon she licked the fat from the dripping skin, sucked the blood from the Khan's bruised finger, and said, "now I have licked the blood of the cruel Khakan and the fat of his instigator Chuchia." I have long wished to avenge the death of my partner. If I, myself, now die, I shall be free again. Let me, Khakan, return speedily to my house. The Khan, infatuated with her beauty, was not even angry with her.

---

CHAPTER X.

MONGOLS OF THE CENTRE—FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

THE Mongol dynasty in China ruled barely a hundred years, but within that time the Mongols, who had followed their rulers in their Eastern conquests, had given up the heathenism of their native land and had become good Buddhists. In Western Persia and in the countries round about Persia, the Mongols had become Mussulmans, and were living under conditions far different from those that rule in their native steppes whence Chenghiz Khan had called them forth to conquer. But those of the race who had remained in Central Asia were for hundreds of years much what they had been before, true Nomads, pasturing enormous flocks, despising agriculture and crowded towns. The division of the Central Khanate whose first ruler was Chagatai, a son of Chenghiz, into a Western and Eastern Khanate, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, the Western being constituted of Mawara-an-Naher with its numerous towns and its far spread agriculture, and the Eastern being the North-Western part of the country now known as Chinese Turkestan, cut off, roughly speaking, the Mongols of the West, who although originally wanderers had through inter-marriage and other reasons become practically one with the races of Western Asia whom they had conquered and the wandering Mongols of the East. The country lying by the side of the Thian Shan Mountains, North of Kashgaria, was par excellence Moghulistan, but from the civilization of China in the East to that of Khorasan and Persia on the West in every place where plentiful pasture was to be found, was also to be found the wandering Mongol. For a long time he remained true not only to his old life but to his religion; little by little, however, external faiths conquered him. In the far East he became a Buddhist; elsewhere a Muhammedan. His Muhammedanism was in some respects peculiar; nowhere in Islam did the Khwajah, the Pir, the saint as we would call him, rise to the same influence as in Central Asia, where he was often as much a ruler and a physician as an expounder of the law of Islam.

The Western Khanate soon came to an end, Amir Taimur, the mighty Tamerlane, causing it to cease in the latter half of the fourteenth century, but in the East the Khans were still recognized as the heads of the Mongol race for centuries after the death of Taimur. These rulers had not the absolute powers, which Mussulman rulers in the East everywhere exercised. The condition of their subjects forbade this. A people that consisted of Nomad tribes with no definite territorial limits could not be kept under subjection as a race of agriculturalists, such as have from a very early time inhabited the more fertile part of India. In fact the real power over the wandering families that constituted the Eastern Khanate was exercised, not by the Khan at all, but by the Dughlat Amirs. The Dughlats were an older race than the Moghuls in these regions, being however ethnically related, and being in direct touch with the people themselves.

How great the powers of some of these Amirs were, may be gathered from the two special privileges granted by Tughluk Taimur Khan to Amir Bulaj. This man's ancestor had been granted, so Mirza Haidar says, the following seven privileges by Chinghiz Khan:—(1) Tabl (or the drum). (2) Alam (or the Standard), the former being called in Turki "nakara," the latter "tumentugh." (3) Two of his servants might wear the "Kushuntugh"—"Kushuntugh" is synonymous with "chapartugh." (4) He might wear the Kur (quiver) in the councils of the Khan, though it is a custom among the Mongols that no one but the Khan might carry his quiver in his hand. (5) Certain privileges in connection with the Khan's hunt. (6) He was to be an Amir over all the Mongols, and in the "firmans" his name was to be entered as, "Sirdar of the Ulus of Mongols." (7) In the presence of the Khan, the other Amirs were to sit a bow's length further than he from the Khan. These privileges were mainly ceremonial though they doubtless, and particularly the two last, meant real power. The two new privileges are described as follows :—

‘The first of the new privileges was, that he should have the power of dismissing or appointing Amirs of Kushuns (that is, Amirs who had one thousand followers) without applying to, or consulting with the Khan; and the second was as follows: Bulaji and his descendants should be permitted to commit nine crimes without being tried. On committing the tenth offence, the trial should be conducted under the following conditions :—The accused should sit upon a white two-year-old horse; under the hoofs of the horse, nine folds of white felt should be placed—as a token of respect—and he should in that position address the Khan, while the Khan should speak to him from an elevation. When the interrogatory and investigation had been conducted in this fashion, if the offence should be a mortal one, and the other nine crimes should also be proved against him, two Amirs should stand by and watch him while his veins were opened and all his blood was drawn from his body. Thus he should perish. Then the two Amirs, wailing and lamenting, should carry his body out.’

The Historian of Moghulistan is Mirza Haidar, a close relation of Babar. This history has been translated into English by the late Mr. Ney Elias whose introduction to the same is of the greatest value to the student. Mr. Elias travelled much in this land of the Mongols and is able to give local colouring where otherwise interest in Mirza Haidar's book would evaporate. Much of the latter's work, the Tarikh-i-Rashidi, is of a tiresome nature and no one save a specialist can be interested in the names and doings of a number of obscure Khans who one after the other were supposed to rule over the Moghuls of this land of Moghulistan (or Jateh as it is sometimes called). But Mirza Haidar's work has much more colour in it than most Muhammedan histories of the time, and parts of it can be read with pleasure by all. Take for instance this story. ‘The last of the sons was called Shaikh Jamal-ud-din, an austere man, who dwelt in Katak.’

On a certain Friday, after the prayers, he preached to the people and said : " I have already on many occasions preached to you and given you good counsel, but no one of you has listened to me. It has now been revealed to me that God has sent down a great calamity on this town. A Divine ordinance permits me to escape and save myself from this disaster. This is the last sermon I shall preach to you. I take my leave of you, and remind you that our next meeting will be on the day of resurrection."

" Having said this,* the Shaikh came down from the pulpit. The Muazzin (crier to prayer) followed him and begged that he might be allowed to accompany him. The Shaikh said he might do so. When they had journeyed three farsakhs they halted, and the Muazzin asked permission to return to the town to attend to some business, saying, he would come back again immediately. As he was passing the mosque he said to himself : ' For the last time, I will just go and call out the evening prayer.' So he ascended the minaret and called the evening prayer. As he was doing so, he noticed that something was raining down from the sky ; it was like snow, but dry. He finished his 'call,' and then stood praying for a while. Then he descended, but found that the door of the minaret was blocked, and he could not get out. So he again ascended and, looking round, discovered that it was raining sand, and to such a degree that the whole town was covered ; after a little while he noticed that the ground was rising, and at last, only a part of the minaret was left free. So, with fear and trembling, he threw himself from the tower on to the sand ; and at midnight he rejoined the Shaikh, and told him his story. The Shaikh immediately set out on his road, saying : ' It is better to keep at a distance from the wrath of God.' They fled in great haste ; and that city is, to this day, buried in sand. Sometimes a wind comes, and lays bare the minaret or the top of the dome. It often happens also that a strong wind uncovers a house, and when any one enters it he finds everything in perfect order, though the master has become white bones. But no harm has come to the inanimate things."

* Tarikh-i-Rashaidi, p. 11.

How Taimur Tughluk Khan was converted to Muhammedanism is related in the following manner:—*“ At that time Tughluk Taimur Khan was in Aksu. When he had first been brought there he was sixteen years of age. He was eighteen when he first met the Shaikh, and he met him in the following way. The Khan had organised a hunting party, and he promulgated an order that no one should absent himself from the hunt. It was, however, remarked that some persons were seated in a retired spot. The Khan sent to fetch these people, and they were seized, bound and brought before him, inasmuch as they had transgressed the commands of the Khan, and had not presented themselves at the hunt. The Khan asked them: ‘Why have you disobeyed my commands?’ The Shaikh replied: ‘We are strangers, who have fled from the ruined town of Katak. We know nothing about the hunt nor the ordinances of the hunt, and therefore we have not transgressed your orders.’ So the Khan ordered his men to set the Tajik free. He was at that time feeding some dogs with swine’s flesh, and he asked the Shaikh angrily: ‘Are you better than this dog, or is the dog better than you?’ The Shaikh replied: ‘If I have faith I am better than this dog; but if I have no faith, this dog is better than I am.’ On hearing these words, the Khan retired and sent one of his men, saying; ‘Go and place that Tajik upon your own horse, with all due respect, and bring him here to me.’

“The Mongol went and led his horse before the Shaikh. The Shaikh, noticing that the saddle was stained with the blood of a pig, said: ‘I will go on foot.’ But the Mongol insisted that the order was that he should mount the horse. The Shaikh then spread a clean handkerchief over the saddle and mounted. When he arrived before the Khan, he noticed that this latter was standing alone in a retired spot, and there were traces of sorrow on his countenance. The Khan asked the Shaikh: ‘What is this thing that renders man, if he possess it, better than a dog?’ The Shaikh replied: ‘Faith,’ and he explained to him what Faith was, and the duties of a Mussulman. The Khan wept thereat, and said: 'If I ever become Khan, and obtain absolute authority, you must, without fail, come to me, and I promise you I will become a Mussulman.' He then sent the Shaikh away with the utmost respect and reverence. Soon after this the Shaikh died. He left a son of the name of Arshad-ud-Din, who was exceedingly pious. His father once dreamed that he carried a lamp up to the top of a hill, and that its light illuminated the whole of the East. After that, he met Tughluk Taimur Khan in Aksu, and said what has been mentioned above. Having related this to his son, he charged him, saying: 'Since I may die at any moment, let it be your care, when the young man becomes Khan, to remind him of his promise to become a Mussulman; thus blessing may come about through your meditation, and through you, the world may be illumined.'

* Tarikh-i-Bashaidi, pp. 12 to 15.

"Having completed his injunctions to his son, the Shaikh died. Soon afterwards Tughluk Taimur became Khan. When news of this reached Maūlana Arshad-ud-Din, he left Aksu and proceeded to Moghulistan, where the Khan was ruling in great pomp and splendour. But all his efforts to obtain an interview with him, that he might execute his charge, were in vain. Every morning, however, he used to call out prayers near to the Khan's tent. One morning the Khan said to one of his followers: 'Somebody has been calling out like this for several mornings now; go and bring him here.' The Maulana was in the middle of his call to prayer when the Mongol arrived, who, seizing him by the neck, dragged him before the Khan. The latter said to him: 'Who are you that thus disturb my sleep every morning at an early hour?' He replied: 'I am the son of the man to whom, on a certain occasion, you made the promise to become a Mussulman.' And he proceeded to recount the above related story. The Khan then said: 'You are welcome and where is your father?' He replied: 'My father is dead, but he entrusted this mission to me.' The Khan rejoined: 'Ever since I ascended the throne I have had it on my mind that I made that promise, but the person to whom I gave the pledge never came.'

Now you are welcome. What must I do?' On that morn the sun of bounty rose out of the East of divine favour, and effaced the dark night of Unbelief. Khidmat Maulana ordained ablution for the Khan, who, having declared his faith, became a Mussulman. They then decided that for the propagation of Islam, they should interview the princes one by one, and it should be well for those who accepted the faith, but those who refused should be slain as heathens and idolators.

"On the following morning, the first to come up to be examined alone was Amir Tulik, who was my great grand-uncle. When he entered the Khan's presence, he found him sitting with the Tajik, and he advanced and sat down with them also. The Khan began by asking, 'Will you embrace Islam?' Amir Tulik burst into tears and said: 'Three years ago I was converted by some holy men at Kashghar, and became a Mussulman but, from fear of you, I did not openly declare it.' Thereupon the Khan rose up and embraced him; then the three sat down again together. In this manner they examined the princes one by one. All accepted Islam, till it came to the turn of Jaras, who refused, but suggested two conditions, one of which was: 'I have a man named Sataghni Buka, if this Tajik can overthrow him I will become a Believer.' The Khan and the Amirs cried out, 'What absurd condition is this?' Khidmat Maulana, however, said: 'It is well, let it be so. If I do not throw him, I will not require you to become a Mussulman.' Jaras then said to the Maulana: 'I have seen this man lift up a two years old camel. He is an infidel, and above the ordinary stature of men.' Khidmat Maulana replied: 'If it is God's wish that the Mongols become honoured with the blessed state of Islam, He will doubtless give me sufficient power to overcome this man.' The Khan and those who had become Mussulmans were not pleased with these plans. However, a large crowd assembled, the Kafir was brought in, and he and Khidmat Maulana advanced towards one another. The infidel, proud of his own strength, advanced with a conceited air. The Maulana looked very small and weak beside him. When they came to blows, the Maulana struck the infidel full in the chest, and he fell senseless. After a little, he came to again and having raised himself, fell again at the feet of the Maulana, crying out and uttering words of Belief. The people raised loud shouts of applause, and on that day 160,000 persons cut off the hair of their heads and became Mussulmans. The Khan was circumcised, and the light of Islam dispelled the shades of Unbelief. Islam was disseminated all through the country of Chagatai Khan, and (thanks be to God) has continued fixed in it to the present time."

Mirza Haidar recounts the death of his great grand-father thus: "In short, the Amir went to Mekka. When my father (God have mercy on him) went to Khorasan, as I have mentioned in the second part, he found there one of the Generals of Sultan Husain Mirza, named Sultan Alim Barlas, who was a very old man, being nearly one hundred years of age. He had been held in great honour by the Mirza. My father questioned him concerning his ancestors and their times. He replied: 'My father's name was Shah Husain Barlas. He was one of the Mongol Barlases and a distinguished Amir. Amir Khudaidad travelled with him from Moghulistan.' When my father heard this story, he became greatly interested and begged him (the Barlas) to narrate the whole history. The latter began: 'I was quite a boy when Mir Khudaidad undertook his pilgrimage to Mekka, and my father accompanied him, for he was in the service of the Amir. We fled from Moghulistan and wandered from town to town, till we set out upon the journey to visit the holy town of Mekka; when we had been a few days on our return journey, the Amir asked where Medina was, they told him that Medina lay in a different direction.' At this the Amir was much distressed, and said: 'I have come a great distance and suffered many privations; yet I have not made the tawaf (circuit) of the garden of the Prophet (may the peace and prayers of God be upon him) and it is a long journey home again.'

"He then gave all his servants and porters leave to return home with the caravan, sending with them many letters and messages for his children in Moghulistan. One of these letters has passed down from father to son into my possession, for it had always been carefully preserved in our family. In short, the Amir and his wife started for Medina unencumbered, making an Arab go in front to guide them. My father sent me with him too, so I was of the Amir's party. After a long journey we arrived at Medina. The Amir made the tawaf of the garden of the Prophet (upon whom be the most excellent of prayers), and we passed the night in the house of a dervish. As night came on a great change manifested itself in the Amir. He called my father (i.e., Shah Husain Barlas) and said to him: 'Read me the chapter called Ya-sin;' when my father came to the verse 'Mislahum Bala' the Amir expired. We were all astounded at this occurrence. With the break of day, many of the nobles and people of Medina came to the house, asking: 'Did not some one die here last night?' and when we told them, they began to condole with us, and said: 'We have this night seen the Prophet in our sleep and he said to us: a guest has come to me to-night; he had made a very long journey to visit me, and he has died here during the night: bury him at the foot of the tomb of the Commander of the Faithful Osman.' Then the Prophet drew a line with the end of his stick. As soon as we awoke, we went and found that a line had been drawn there. Happy the man who has been honoured with such a favour! The nobles of Medina buried the Amir at the feet of Osman with great honour. On the following night the wife of the Amir died also, and she was buried near where her husband had been laid."

When Sultan Ali Barlas reached this spot in his narrative, my father showed signs of great happiness; whereupon they questioned him as to the cause of his delight. My father replied: * "This Amir Khudaidad was my grandfather." Sultan Ali Barlas immediately got up and having embraced my father and said: "What I have told you is true. But no news of the death of the Amir ever reached Moghulistan, for on our return journey we settled down for some time in Irak, and then in Khorasan, and no one brought the news into Moghulistan.

* Tarikh-i-Rashidi, pp. 70—71.

Thanks be to God that I have been able to give this news to you, and tell you what a noble death Amir Khudaidad died."

The great Taimur brought the Mongols of Moghulistan into more or less complete subjection. The Khans became absolutely powerless vassals of this great ruler. But with his death they resumed their independence and there was constant strife between the descendants of Taimur who ruled over Mawar-an-Naher and the Mongols who nominally under their Khan roamed over Moghulistan. One of the Khan family, Yunus Khan, was taken away from Moghulistan by Mirza Ulugh Beg a Taimuride at the age of 24 and only returned there at the age of 41. Most of the time he spent in study at Yazd in Persia; the rest of the time he spent in wandering over the Muhammedan civilised West. He was sent back to Moghulistan by Mirza Said Khan who ruled in Khorasan and who hoped that by sending him into Moghulistan as a rival to his brother the reigning Khan, Isad Bugha Khan, his own plans would be forwarded. A battle between the followers of the Khans ensued, which resulted in the defeat of Yunus Khan and his return to Khorasan. He frequently re-attempted to conquer the country during the reign of Isad Bugha Khan, and the latter's worthless son, Dost Mohommed Khan, but never succeeded. After the latter's death he, however, peacefully entered the country and reigned in name at least over the Mongols for many years. He was always a lover of towns while his people's only happy life was in tents, and though for a time he too became a Nomad, his passion for towns was too strong for him, and consequently towards the end of his life the tribes of the North Steppes raised his second son Sultan Ahmed to the Khanate. Yunus Khan died in 1487 A. D.

An account given by Mirza Haidar gives a vivid account of the vicissitudes of warfare at the time.

*" When the inhabitants of Turkestan learnt the news of the advance of the Mongols in their territory, and having ascertained that Yunus Khan was at Kara Tukai, they sent Buruj out with all speed to attack him. On that day the Khan happened to be out hunting with all his men near the banks of the Sihun. Buruj, crossing the river on the ice at midday, found the camp of the Khan undefended; he had 20,000 soldiers with him, and there were at that time 60,000 families of Mongols. They entered the camp and each soldier made himself master of an untenanted house. They settled down in the Khan's camp, occupying themselves with the appropriation of all the wealth and spoil they found there.

* Tarikh-i-Rashtdi, pp. 92—93.

When the news of this matter reached the Khan he immediately abandoned the hunt, and set out in the direction of his camp without waiting to collect his men; when he reached the river he found it was frozen over. The Khan's camp was pitched on the opposite bank of the river. The Khan could blow the horn (nafir) better than any one of his day, and all his men knew the sound of his blast. He now gave a loud blast on the horn, and then rushed across the ice, accompanied by six men, one of whom was the bearer of the great standard (Shash Tughji). The women hearing the approach of the Khan seized all the Uzbeks who were in their houses. When Buruj Oghlan heard the sound of the horn and saw the six men and the standard, he rose up with the intent of mounting his horse, but the female servants had seized both his groom (akhtaji) and his horse. Some women at that moment came out of their houses and seized Buruj Oghlan, when the Khan, arriving upon the scene, ordered them to behead him; this order was carried out immediately, and of the 20,000 Uzbeks a few only escaped. The Khan then again settled down, victorious, in his camp. On the morrow, when the army had re-assembled, the pursuit of the enemy was continued, and all the Sultans of Abulhair Khan who survived, were scattered in different directions." A second story of the time and of women's part therein is too characteristic to be omitted.

"This same Isar Daulat Begum was given, as a present, by Sheikh Jamal Khan, to one of his most distinguished officers. When the Begum heard of this, she made no objections, but appeared pleased. They then informed Khwaja Kalan (as this officer was named) of the Begum's pleasure: he too was much pleased, and in the evening went to her house. He found her servants standing outside. He himself entered her room. Now, before his arrival, the Begum had arranged with her female attendants (dahan) that on a given sign from herself, they should make fast all the doors of the house. So when Khwaja Kalan had entered the room, having fastened the doors, the female attendants laid hold of him and put him to death, by stabbing him with knives (kizlik). When the day broke they threw his body outside. Some person seeing the Khwaja's dead body, went and reported the matter to Sheikh Jamal, who sent to ask the Begum the meaning of it all. The Begum replied : * ' I am the wife of Sultan Yunus Khan ; Sheikh Jamal gave me to some one else ; this is not allowed by Muhammedan law, so I killed the man and Sheikh Jamal Khan may kill me also if he likes.' Sheikh Jamal commended her words, and, taking pity on her, sent her back with all honour to the Khan (her husband)."

Yunus Khan's personal appearance was thus described by a Muhammedan holy man of Mawar-an-Naher.

† " I had heard that Yunus Khan was a Moghul, and I concluded that he was a beardless man, with the ways and manners of any other Turk of the desert. But when I saw him, I found he was a person of elegant deportment, with a full beard and a Tajik face, and such refined speech and manner, as is seldom to be found even in a Tajik." In short, when his Holiness had seen the Khan, he addressed letters to all the Sultans round about, saying : " I have seen Yunus Khan and the Mongols. The subjects of such a padi-shah are not to be carried off captives. They are people of Islam."

On this the author remarks :—

" From this time forth, no more Mongols were brought or sold as slaves in Mawar-an-Naher and Khorasan, for before this, the Mongols had been purchased as other Kaffirs are purchased." This proves first by how far non-Mongol blood had infected the old Mongolian stock (the present day Turk has only infinitesimal Mongolian blood in him), and secondly, that the Mongols of Moghulistan of that day, though nominally Muhammedans, were really still heathen.

* Tarikh-i-Rashidi, p. 94.

† Tarikh-i-Rashidi, Introduction, p. 79

CHAPTER XI.

TOWARDS the end of the fifteenth century and the beginning of the sixteenth after Christ four men stand out par excellence in the history of Central Western Asia: Mirza Aba Bakr, Shahi Beg Khan (Shaibani), Shah Ismail and Baber, the first of the Delhi Moghul Emperors. Of these, the first, one of the many descendants of Taimur made his way to power by a mixture of treachery and force, first of all seizing Yarkund and Khotan and then by driving Yunus Khan out of Kashghar. Shahi Beg who was an Uzbek, was originally a follower of the son of Yunus Khan, Sultan Ahmed Khan who made him a ruler over Turkistan. This Sultan Ahmed Khan is described as not knowing the value of men and of imagining whomsoever he favoured a valuable man. Consequently he was misled by pernicious advisers and put to death his principal Amirs. He favoured Shaibani, who, when he had taken Samarkand and Bokhara from the Taimurides, turned against him, defeated him in battle and took him prisoner. He sent him away with all courtesy along with his brother to Moghulistan, but on his returning to the country again and presenting himself a second time before him, he remarked that a second kindness would be dangerous and had him drowned. By this time Shaibani had become the most powerful ruler in Mawer-an-Naher. A story told of this man's strength of character is to be found in the Tarikh-i-Rashidi. The Mahmud Sultan mentioned therein was his chief supporter at the time, being very influential with the soldiery

* "I have heard the Khan relate, in terms of wonder and admiration, that when Shahi Beg Khan had conquered Hissar, news was brought of the taking of Kunduz by Mahmud Sultan. Shahi Beg Khan, having entrusted Hissar to Hamza Sultan and Chaghanian to Mahdi Sultan, set out quickly on his return. As the pass of Darbandi-i-Ahanin (The Iron Gate) was very difficult (continued the Khan), and as the army was much burdened with booty, they made the journey, farsakh after farsakh, by way of * Tarikh-i-Rashidi. 171.

---

Buya and Tirmiz. While the victorious army was encamped at Buya, I was sitting once, at midday, in the royal tent (majlis). The hour for the assembly had not yet arrived, and only a few of the king's intimates were present, when somebody with a terrified countenance and wild appearance came in great haste, and laid a letter at the foot of the royal throne. As Shahi Beg perused the contents of this letter a great change came over him, and before he had finished reading it, he rose up and went into his harem, giving orders for his horse to be brought. He remained for some time in the harem; but after midday prayers came out again and mounted his horse. He was attended by a great number of people. Then it was made known that Mahmud Sultan had died a natural death in Kunduz, and that his body was on the way (to the camp). When Shahi Beg Khan had got some distance away, we saw a great crowd in pitch-black clothes, such as captives wear. Having placed the bier upon the ground, they drew up in two lines behind it. When Shahi Beg Khan saw this, he made a sign for all the Sultans and others to dismount and follow in his train. These, having obeyed, began to rise cries of grief and lamentation; and we, in the camp, also commenced to utter moans and wailings. When those attending the bier approached, he ordered all who were with him to draw up a line, while he himself rode forward until his horse's head was just above the bier; he then gave a sign for every one to keep silence, and thereupon those who were with him ceased from rending their garments and tearing their beards. He then called one of the Amirs of Mahmud Sultan, and said to him such things as are usual on occasion of condolence. After this he remained silent for a while, never showing the slightest change in his countenance, nor shedding a tear. At the end of an hour he raised his head and said: "The death of Mahmud is a good thing; men have been wont to say that the power of Shahi Beg Khan was upheld by Mahmud: let it now be known that Shahi Beg Khan was in no way whatever dependant upon Mahmud. Carry him away now, and bury him." Having said this, he turned away and "all present were astounded at his boldness and composure

Of Shah Ismail, the founder of the present national kingdom of Persia and the establisher of Shiism as the predominant creed there, sufficient is it for me to say that it was he that defeated Shaibani near Merv just as the latter seemed about to become a second Taimur. In this battle (A. D. 1510) Shaibani fell; subsequently the Uzbegs partially recovered from the blow; managing to retain the mastery of the fertile countries of Mawer-an-Naher, but never save for short periods through Razzias, in one of which as I have already recorded they sacked Meshed, did they become Rulers of Khorasan or of the other lands to the South of the Oxus.

After his death we are told the two Khans (for there were since Yunus Khan's death two Khans in Moghulistan) after fighting with each other made peace. From this peace and reconciliation between the two brothers, resulted such security and prosperity for the people, that any one might travel alone between Khitai (China) and the country of Ferghana, without provision for the journey and without fear of molestation. The history of the Mongol power in Moghulistan proper at this point ceases from the beginning of the sixteenth century to be of any great general interest as from thenceforth they gave up troubling the outer world.

Aba Bakr came to an evil end. He was according to Mirza Haidar a tyrant of the worst sort. Death, mutilation, torture of prisoners, such is Mirza Haidar's melancholy story. Add to this that he professed in all of his actions that he professed to be acting according to law, and one can reproduce the type of man revolting to contemplate, whether it be Henry VIII of England or Aba Bakr of Kashgar. Cruelty and suspicion march together, and so gradually he put to death all his chief ministers. Consequently when Syed Khan attacked him, he had but few to help him and was driven first out of Kashgar, then out of Khotan, to which place he retreated and finally finding it impossible to stay in Thibet and returning to surrender to Syed Khan, was seized by his own former servants who, as Mirza Haidar says, verified the proverb that "sleep is the brother of death" by slaying him in his sleep. Of Baber, the first Moghul Emperor, I shall write later on at length.

CHAPTER XII.

TAIMUR.

TAIMUR was born in the year 1336 at Kech, the green city, in Transoxiana, fifty miles South of Samarkand. At the time of his birth Chenghiz Khan had been a little more than a hundred years in his grave. The mark of his destroying hand was still everywhere apparent, but the positive results brought about by him and his successors were gradually being blotted out. The Mongols had indeed established themselves in China; they still ruled the deserts and steppes which stretch from Modern Manchuria to the Volga with a rule more centralised than that which existed before Chenghiz but still of a fluid nature as rule over wandering hordes must ever be; but in South-Western Asia, the immemorial home of civilization and the centre of Islam and its learning and culture, the power of the last of the Mongols had declined to almost nothing. It needed a new conqueror to give this power a new lease of life—a lease which did not, however, last longer than the first, for within a little more than a hundred years of Taimur's death a national dynasty was established on the throne of Persia, which from henceforth became permanently Shiah and accordingly apart from the Sunni countries of the Orient. Over the rest of Western Asia, the Ottoman Turk owing to his superior political and military organisation firmly placed his foot—a foot which remains there to the present day. Taimur and Alp Arslan were both Turks; the first Chagatai, the second Osmanli. They both founded dynasties long lived for the Orient; from the former springing the great Moghuls of Delhi, from the latter the Turkish Sultans of Constantinople; but whereas the Delhi Emperors only indirectly succeeded Taimur, his descendants having for a century after his death nothing to do with India,—in the case of Alp Arslan the succession is what in another sphere of human history would be termed apostolic.

We have two accounts of Taimur of the first importance, one the Zafarnamah of Sharafuddin, and the other the Malfuzat-i-Taimur of Nizam-Shah. Both were written shortly after Taimur's death. The first was translated by Petre de la Croix into French in 1722; a year after an English translation from the French appeared. A third book, the Tazukat-i-Taimur, the Institutes of Taimur, although they have been often challenged as apocryphal, will also help in letting us know, if not what manner of man he was, what manner of man he appeared to his descendants or what they wished him to seem to mankind. It seems to me, indeed, that to one carefully reading the Institutes—apart from its account of the arrangements as to his troops, as to their ranks and number and as to the administration of conquered countries, which are too symmetrical to be taken seriously as an accurate statement of the actual state of things, the Institutes are much what we would expect from the two Memoirs stated above. There is an Arab account of Taimur, which naturally enough does not paint him in favourable colours. To the medieval Asiatic writer concerning Taimur all depends on the point of view. No Arab could look with favour upon a ruler whose connection with Arabs was only to depress them. Some Persian Councillors he had; parts of Persia he treated lightly; but in Irak or Arabia or wherever he came in contact with Arabs his hand was hard. In the Persian Memoirs his activity in war, his quickness of resource and his power to bear fatigue are set forth, and as to these there can be no doubt. None but a supremely active, able and enduring man could have done what he did. As to his other characteristics, his generosity, his justice, his administrative powers, less credence need be given to their statements. His holocausts are rarely to be compared to Chenghiz Khan's as regards quantity; he was inclined to grant terms if thereby he got immediate submission; but he was, just like his Mongol predecessor, essentially a man of blood. Human life was nothing to him. A typical Tartar, conquest was more in his eyes than good government; a wandering life was the very breath of his nostrils; he needed ever to be on the move; roaming from one end of Asia to the other. Consequently he might overrun many kingdoms, establish a permanent Monarchy he could not.

In the Institutes Taimur tells us his rule of conquest ;* “ And in whatever country the holy laws are disregarded ; where they neglect those to whom the Almighty hath given dignity ; where they injure and oppress his holy servants ; it is the duty of a conqueror with a firm determination to support the faith and the laws of Muhammed (on whom lie the blessing of God) to invade that country ; for the Prophet of the Lord shall assist him in all his undertakings.” It will be noticed that Taimur here gives a very extended meaning to “ the holy war,” which good Muhammedan rulers according to some of the traditions (by no means all) are enjoined to make. Most of his wars, indeed, were against Mussulmans or at least against professing Mussulmans. Such were his wars against the powers of Western Asia (including the Osmanli Turks) ; such those against the Padshah of Delhi, the Golden Horde, the Horde of Kipchak of the North, and the Mongol Hordes of the East, with whom Taimur was constantly at war ; for they in part at least professed Muhammedanism, though Taimur affected to look on them as Idolators. Indeed the Georgians were the only completely non-Muhammedan people save the Hindus in the Indian army, with whom Taimur ever came into contact.

An account of his life may be divided into four parts : the first, relating to his early struggles until he became the recognised head of the Chagatai Turks ; the second, to his conquest of Persia to the South and of the Steppes to the North, North-West and East (including in this his earlier Georgian wars) ; the third part would tell of his Indian war ; the fourth, of his wars with Egypt and the Osmanli Turk culminating in the great victory of Angora A. D. 1402 and his death.

The first part of his life need not keep us long. He and his brother-in-law Amir Husain had incessant wars with the other petty rulers of Mawar-an-Naher, and also with sections of the hordes to the North of the Jaxartes. On more than one occasion the Khan of the Central Mongol horde intervened, and as other soldiers of fortune in other times, Taimur found himself at times either compelled to accept his nominal liege lord's favour or in any case found it desirable so to do. This period came to an end with the murder of Amir Husain. He had more than once opposed and thwarted Taimur in the latter part of this first period, evidently thinking that Taimur was taking the lion share of the advantages obtained by their union. Amir Husain became Taimur's prisoner after a war between them, the latter having promised that no one should undertake anything against his life. While he was a prisoner, one of Taimur's subject princes complained that Amir Husain had put to death his brother and demanded vengeance against him. This I may say is not the only occasion in the history of Taimur and his descendants that such a request has been made against a captive relative, whom the reigning prince desires to destroy. Taimur told this prince, so we read, that he ought to abandon the prosecution for that his brother's blood would be revenged without his having a hand in it, and quoted a verse of poetry. "Leave him who hath offended you in the hands of time, for time and fortune will avenge you." Husain was consequently let go, but was followed by the complainant together with other servants of Taimur, overtaken and slain. Sharafuddin says, this was done without the leave of Taimur but as he adds, "which punishment being due to him according to the strict rules of justice, the protection of Taimur awaited him nothing," and as we do not read of Taimur having punished the murderers, we may take it that the act done was not displeasing to him. Anyhow, immediately after this murder he was formally seated upon the "Imperial throne" of Chagatai and assumed all the attributes of royalty. We may easily infer that the political maxim set forth by Sharafuddin which I quote below, a maxim often quoted and always acted upon in the East, wherever occasion may serve, really led to Amir Husain's death. "As Sovereignty according to Muhammad is the shadow of God, who is one, it cannot be divided, no more than there could have been two moons in the same heaven." So adds the writer, "to fulfil this truth, God destroys those who oppose him whom providence would fix upon the throne.

---

* Taimur's Institutes, p. 333.

Taimur thus in A. D. 1369 at the age of thirty-three became the head of the Chagatai Turks. For the next thirty years, we find him constantly at war either in Persia and the countries immediately touching it, or with the hordes of the desert. Taimur was as prone as any medieval Catholic, wherever he found a shrine, to pray at it, asking protection from the dead saint, who might be buried there. The reader must remember that almost invariably a Muhammedan shrine is connected with the Mausoleum of some departed worthy. We read in this connection not only of his visiting the tombs of Muhammedan doctors such as Hanifa, but also of the first of the Abbasides, the race of Caliphs who succeeded the Ommyyades, the race of Moawiyah execrated as the persecutors of the family of Muhammad; we also have him at Mosul visiting and praying at the tombs of Jonah and St. George, and we find his ordering Mausoleums to be built for the wives of Muhammad at Damascus. And it was not only dead saints that Taimur particularly revered. We read of his receiving on the magnificent scale Sayid Bereke, a descendant of the Prophet, keeping him with him in his lifetime and directing that both should be laid in the same tomb and that his (Taimur's) face should be turned side ways, so that at the day of judgment when every one should lift up their hands to heaven to implore assistance of some intercessor, he might lay hold on the robe of this child of the Prophet Muhammad.

The state of Persia, when he seized it, is thus graphically described by Sharafuddin. The princes, the successors of Muhammad Mozuffer, * "notwithstanding their affinity hated one another so much, that every one made attempts on the life and estate of his brother and let no occasion slip whereby he might pillage the country; and when anyone gained an advantage over another, if he gave him his life he was sure to blind him with a hot iron, the father spared not the son, nor the son the father. But what was worst of all, the poor people bore the burden of these disorders and were in a manner the tennis ball of misfortune and misery and groaned under the weight of tyranny and oppression." Taimur on conquering the country put all of the race of Muhammad Mozuffer to death. His holocausts in these wars are not to be compared as I have said in extent to those of Chenghiz Khan. But still on occasions they were something awful. Thus at Teheran seventy thousand heads were counted. At the second taking of Baghdad in 1401 A. D., which I have previously mentioned in my account of the fall of the Mongols in Persia, we read—* "As there had been several Tartar soldiers slain in the general assault, each soldier was ordered to bring one head of the men of Baghdad, which they accordingly did, and spared neither old men of four score nor children of eight years of age. No quarter was given to either rich or poor, and the number of the dead was so great, that no one could count them up, though the Tavachis had orders to register it. Towers were made of these heads, to serve as an example to posterity. Some learned men found means to cast themselves at the feet of the Emperor, who granted them pardon and quarter, and even gave them vests and horses, with a convoy to conduct them to what place of security they desired; all the rest of the inhabitants were exterminated. Afterwards Taimur gave orders that there should not remain one single house in the city unrazed; but that the mosques, colleges and hospitals should be spared. Accordingly they ruined the markets, caravanserais, hermitages, cells, monasteries, palaces, and other edifices. Thus says the Alkoran, "The houses of the impious are overthrown by the order of God."

---

* Petis de la Croix. Vol. II, p. 421.

The Arabian author says there were ninety thousand inhabitants of Baghdad on this occasion slain in cold blood and that the heads made one hundred and twenty towers. Not less gruesome is the story of the punishment of two thousand slaves who had rebelled. These were piled alive one upon the other with mortar and bricks. In the following section which relates to the Indian Expeditions the Delhi massacre will be mentioned. From this we may infer that Taimur, although not the equal to Chengiz

---

* Petis de la Croix, Vol. II, p. 216.

Khan, trod in his steps very closely. Taimur's administration of justice was very strict. In the East generally there is but one punishment and that is death, and about inflicting this Taimur never hesitated. On one occasion where a complaint was made to him that a subject prince was tyrannising over the town of Irjab and had slain an Imperial Officer, the prince was handed over with two hundred of his followers to the officer's brother, who assisted by three of his servants cut off all their heads and made a tower of them. So, writes the author who tells us about this, we see that passage of the Koran fulfilled which threatens tyrants with confusion and ruin. As to his wars in the North in the Steppes round and North of the Caspian Sea, he seems more or less effectually to have broken the strength of the Hordes which roamed there. In so doing he really laid the foundation of the power of Modern Russia. The Slav was never in a position to contend with the Mongol and the Tartar until the latter by fratricidal conflict had fatally weakened themselves. The Russian has indeed taken in these Steppes the place of the Mongol, agriculture has largely supplanted the pasturing of cattle, but the people remain at bottom more or less fundamentally the same. The same spirit of wandering and the want of resistance has made the Modern Russian wander and wander until he has been stopped by the Pacific Ocean. Westward his limits are fixed; it is only by the accident that Brandenburg became a great power in the eighteenth century and not in the sixteenth or seventeenth that the Russian holds the German Baltic provinces; probably if Prussia had been a great state sooner there would too have been no Russian Poland. Towards the East her course has been free and the overthrow of the power of the Muhammedan Hordes effectually completed by Taimur has left the road clear. Petis de la Croix derives the name Russia from one of the Horde rulers Rusous Khan—a fanciful derivation.

We read that Taimur got so far north, so near the pole that in the evening before the sun was entirely set the rays of the morning appeared in the east and in these places when the sun is in the Northern signs, it is not permitted according to the ordinance of the Muhammedan law that the evening prayer should be made To Taimur's Indian Expedition I give a special Section.

TAIMUR'S INVASION OF INDIA.*

The reason for the invasion of India by Taimur as given by himself was the desire to lead an expedition against the infidels and to become a Ghazi. It is not uncharitable to add that the desire of plunder was also a very powerful motive. Delhi had escaped the fate which had befallen almost every city of the Muhammedan East since the days that Chinghiz Khan, the scourge of God had entered on his devastating career at the end of the twelfth century after Christ. In this respect Cairo alone of the great cities of the Muhammedan world had been equally fortunate. Delhi indeed had been more or less depopulated by Muhammad Tughlak, when he attempted to shift the centre of the Muhammedan power in India to Deogiri (Daulatabad) in the Northern confines of the Indian peninsula, but probably the city had not suffered much thereby either as regards its buildings or its wealth. She still remained the centre of the Indian Muhammedan world, the store house of Indian wealth. And how great that was, the enormous area of fertile land there was in India compared with that in any other country of Western Asia, the accumulations of wealth in the great towns, as testified to us by all that we can learn of India as it then was, teach us.

Taimur had no intention of staying in India. His mission was to destroy not to build up. In the Memoirs we read—some of the nobles said—"By the favour of Almighty God we may conquer India but if we establish ourselves permanently therein, our race will degenerate and our children will become like the natives of those regions and in a few generations their strength and valour will diminish." Taimur replies "My object in the invasion of Hindustan is to lead an expedition against the infidels that according to the law of Muhammad (upon whom and his family lie the blessing of peace of God) we may convert to the true faith the people of that country, and purify the land itself from the filth of infidelity and polytheism; and that we may overthrow their temples and idols and become Ghazis and Mujahids before God."* Such was the cover of words and doubtless Taimur, a Muhammedan, still more a Tartar, fervently believed that he was doing God's service in carrying on what he considered a holy war, but the strongest motive, though to his consciousness it may have been obscured, was the desire for plunder and destruction. It is noticeable in men of Taimur's type that their holy war does not confine itself to infidels alone. If the people of Islam, true Muhammedans, oppose him so much the worse for them. They have ceased to be Mussalmans and have become of the tribe of Kafirs. They too must be exterminated. In men of his stamp, whatever their form of religion may be, deep in their hearts is the belief that they are, if not God, at least God's sons. Opposition to them is rebellion against the most High.

* Elliott, Vol. III, p. 397.

Taimur, after having much conflict with the wild Siyah poshes of the Afghan hills, crossed the Indus on the 24th of September 1398. His troops seem to have passed the Afghan ranges by the Bolan or some other of the southern passes. His son who had preceded him, had been engaged for months in the seige of Multan. His first operations were against a Muhammedan leader Shahabuddin. On his overthrow and death he self-contentedly remarks—[I heard,† "that Shahabuddin had drowned himself after having first thrown his wives and children into the river, which utter annihilation of his family was very pleasing to me." A little later at a small town Talumba, held for ransom by him, he orders the townsmen to pay their ransom in grain instead of money. The natural consequence followed that the town was ransacked, upon which we read in his Memoirs the following.‡ "The hungry Tartars, making a general assault upon them like ants and locusts, plundered an enormous number of granaries, so numerous indeed as to be incalculable and according to the text, 'Verily Kings, when they enter a city utterly ruin it,' the hungry Tartars opened the hands of devastation in the city."

* Elliott, Vol. III, p. 397.

† Elliott, Vol. III, p. 412.

‡ Elliott, Vol. III, p. 414.

After the conquest of Multan, Taimur prepared for his march on Delhi. Previous conquerors had marched by the Northern route keeping well to the middle of the fertile lands of the Punjab, passing through Lahore and Sirhind. Taimur, on the other hand, determined to strike through the desert. Reasons for this were probably that his intention was to end his expedition before the expiry of the cold weather, and the fact that his army was comparatively small and chiefly consisted of horsemen, not cavalry of the modern type but rather what we would call nowadays mounted infantry. A portion of his army did indeed march by the North and it did meet him before the final assault on Delhi; but he had evidently discounted the fact of this body not being able to meet him at all. By the desert route he only had to pass one great fortress, Bhatnir. This stands on the Northern verge of the great Rajput desert. Its ruler's name is given as Dal Chand. In the Memoirs we are told how Dal Chand more than once prayed for quarter and promised to surrender the fort; how he broke his word, how eventually he came out and surrendered himself; but how a number alike of Hindus and Mussalmans fought to the last; "the Infidels and Mussalmans in the fort now found their case desperate. The infidels shut up their wives and children in their houses, to which they set fire, and they and their families were burned altogether; those who called themselves Mussalmans, but who had strayed from the Muhammedan fold, killed their wives and children with the sword, and then boldly facing death rushed together into the fight." "In a short space of time all the people in the fort were put to the sword, and in the course of one hour the heads of ten thousand infidels were cut off. The sword of Islam was washed in the blood of the infidels, and all the goods and effects, the treasure and the grain which for many a long year had been stored in the fort, became the spoil of my soldiers." In the Zafar-Nama, the story is told in an even gruesome fashion: "The Kafirs (infidels) set fire to the place, and cast their wives and children into the fire and consumed them.* A party of them who called themselves Mussulmans, cut off the heads of their wives and children like so many sheep." "Victory at length favoured our arms. Ten thousand of the infidels were slain; the houses were set on fire and the whole place was destroyed. Nothing was left but a heap of ashes."

---

*Elliott, Vol. III, p. 491.

From Bhatnir on he marched to Delhi. On his way he mentions having had trouble with the Jats, whom he says were Mussalmans only by name and robbers by profession. The Jats are probably an older importation of the Tartar race into India, dating as far back as the early centuries of the Christian Era, and are now mainly Hindu by religion. Anyhow with the usual amount of satisfaction which Taimur evinces, when describing wholesale slaughter, he tells us how he slew 2,000 demon-like Jats and saved the country from the terror it had long suffered at their hands. Nearing Delhi he was met by those of his troops who had marched further North through the more fertile tracts of the Punjab. Near to Panipat he falls in with a colony of Sunawis (fire-worshippers). These cannot have been the ancestors of the Parsis of India of the present day, but they were evidently connected in some way with Persia as they held to the Persian belief of two gods, one of goodness Yazdon, and one of evil Ahriman.* Taimur notes as arch-heresy on their part that they did not know "that whatsoever there is of evil comes from God and that man is the mere instrument of its execution." This is the fatalism of Islam in its coarsest form. Chinghiz Khan, Tamerlane, Napoleon in such matters always speak in the same tone. Add that the instrument of God in each case is themselves and you have the world conqueror's belief in a nutshell. When Taimur approached Delhi, he found that he would have to fight a battle before capturing the city. The name of the Chief General of Sultan Muhammad of Delhi was Mallu Khan. A large army, the number of which Taimur gives as 10,000 horse and 40,000 infantry, was arrayed to oppose him. The chief strength of the Delhi army consisted in its 125 war elephants. These animals turned out to be, as so often has been in the case in Indian warfare, of no great use.* Before the battle a wholesale slaughter of the Hindu prisoners was ordered. I transcribe here from* Elliott's translation of the Malfuzat-i-Timur an account of what occurred. A more ghastly story rendered more nauseous by the self-contented tone of the writer can hardly be conceived.

*Elliott, Vol. III, p. 431.

“At this Court Amir Jahan Shah and Amir Sulaiman Shah and other Amirs of experience brought to my notice that, from the time of entering Hindustan up to the present time, we had taken more than 100,000 infidels and Hindus prisoners, and that they were all in my camp. On the previous day, when the enemy's force made the attack upon us, the prisoners made signs of rejoicings, uttered imprecations against us, and were ready, as soon as they heard of the enemy's success, to form themselves into a body, break their bonds, plunder our tents, and then to go and join the enemy, and so increase his numbers and strength. I asked their advice about the prisoners and they said that on the great day of battle these 100,000 prisoners could not be left with the baggage and that it would be entirely opposed to the rules of law to set these idolators and foes of Islam at liberty. In fact no other course remained but that of making them all food for the sword. When I heard these words I found them in accordance with the rules of war and I directly gave my command for the Tawachis to proclaim throughout the camp that every man who had infidel prisoners was to put them to death, and whoever neglected to do so should himself be executed and his property given to the informer. When this order became known to the Ghazis of Islam they drew their swords and put their prisoners to death. 100,000 infidels, impious idolators, were on that day slain. Maulana Nasiruddin Umar, a councillor and man of learning, who in all his life had never killed a sparrow, now in execution of my order, slew with his sword fifteen idolators, Hindus, who were his captives.”

The following after what has been written will be read with a feeling of relief: “I enquired of the learned and good men that accompanied my army, such as ..... where they would like to be placed on the day of the battle. They had been with me in many campaigns and had witnessed many a great battle, but the stories about the elephants of India had so affected them that they instantly replied that they would like to be placed with the ladies while the battle was in progress. So to allay the apprehensions of this class of men, I gave orders that all the buffaloes which had been taken and placed with the baggage should be bought up; I then had their necks and heads fastened to their legs, and placed the animals inside the abattis." We have only accounts of the fight from the one side. The details given are as tiresome as a modern despatch; the net result was that the Indian host was unable to withstand the hardy warriors of Turkestan and that the elephants did no harm. With the defeat of the army all resistance ceased, and on Wednesday, the 17th of December 1398, Taimur entered Delhi. He ordered that quarter should be given to the people, as he says out of respect to the Sayads and learned men, and that the Khutba should be repeated in his name. From this date the Moghul rulers were accustomed to count their Kingdom of India.

---

*Elliott. Vol. III, p. 435.

On Thursday the sack of the city commenced. The pious Taimur remarks: "The pen of fate had written down this destiny for the people of this city. Although I was desirous of sparing them, I could not succeed, for it was the will of God that calamity should fall upon this city." The Memoirs give many reasons how it was that the city came to be sacked, but we may take it that the main cause was that Taimur's troops lived by plunder and that they were not to be balked of their prey, even if Taimur had so willed and it is very doubtful whether he did so. The usual horrors ensued. An enormous amount of precious stones of gold and silver was taken and the 100,000 prisoners formerly massacred were replaced by the inhabitants of Delhi whom the Turki soldiers carried off as their spoil.

Taimur on seeing the buildings of Delhi conceived the idea of emulating them in his own home. Consequently he gave special orders as to the builders and stone-masons taken as slaves, that they should be set apart for his special use.

The capture and sack of Delhi is a capital fact in Indian History. The Delhi of that time was not the Delhi of the present day. It was divided into three parts, Siri, Old Delhi and Jahanpanah; many of the remains of these lying to the South of the present City may be seen at the present day by the visitor. What it was in its glory we have but few opportunities of knowing. The Kuth Minar, the great pillar of Altansh erected more than a century and a half previous and intended as a minaret to a gigantic mosque, shows the magnitude of the undertakings of the early Pathan Kings. The beautiful sixty-six coloured Hall as well as the tomb of Khusrau and Nizam Uddin show that the arts of grace were well understood by these old Kings. But one, who really wishes to understand what manner of man the Muhammedan rulers were prior to the inroad of Taimur, must go and gaze at the ruins of Tughlakabad. One of the Tughlak rulers early in the fourteenth century had determined to build a new palace and city for himself. His work had not proceeded far when he met his death. But what he did still remains though in ruins. A wall of huge stones, placed one on the other after the old Cyclopean fashion, includes three square miles of ground. Within this the women's quarters built on the most gigantic style are alone visible. The peacock and goat are to be seen everywhere. The owl now hoots in the palace of Cæsar; but still musing on Cæsar's palace, one's thoughts revert to what Cæsar was or did. These Pathan rulers, whatever else they were, were big men.

Taimur's inroad brought about absolute ruin. Perhaps the best proof of it is that for fifty years after his departure the old silver and gold coinages of India almost entirely disappeared. The coins struck for fifty years after that December Wednesday are almost uniformly copper.

Taimur came to plunder, not to stay. Having sacked Delhi he began his return journey. This time his route is under the Himalaya Hills. He captures Meerut on his way, even then an important Military position and has much fighting near Hurdwar. From there by Kangra and Jummoo he gets into Kashmir; and from there returns to his beloved Samarkand. Behind him he leaves ruin; everywhere destruction, nowhere construction; and the only immediate effect on the political condition of Hindustan is that for many years to come the various rulers of the provinces, and for some time even the ruler in Delhi itself, affect to consider themselves as Vicegerents for Taimur or his successors. Indirectly Taimur's invasion and the fact that the Khutba was read for many years in his and his sons and grandsons' name laid a legal foundation for Babar's claim to the Lordship of Hindustan, a claim which, however, had to be substantiated not by legal disquisitions but by the force of the sword.

Sharaf Uddin has this note as to the sources of the Ganges. * "The defile of Ampele (near Hurdwar) is situate at the foot of a mountain near the Ganges; and sixteen miles higher than this defile is a stone carved in the form of a cow from whence springs this great river. For this reason the Indians adore this stone; and in all the neighbouring countries within a year's journey when they are at prayers they turn towards it." As a fact the place where the Ganges issues from the Himalayan Mountain, Gangutri, is known as Gou Mukhi (the cow's mouth), the boulders there showing a fanciful sort of similarity to the mouth of a cow. It is more than a hundred miles, however, from Hurdwar and the Hindus certainly at the present day do not in their prayers turn towards it.

CHAPTER XIII.

TAIMUR'S culminating military exploits were in the last years of his life when he was at an age at which most conquerors seek repose. In A. D. 1401 he sacked Baghdad. The slaughter was enormous. The siege had been protracted and the besieging army had lost many men. Consequently no quarter was shown. I have already quoted one account of the sack. Let me give another. "Their heads," says Sherif Uddin Taimur's panegyrist, "were built up into towers as a warning to prosperity, and that men should not raise their feet higher than their capacity." Orders were given that every house was to be destroyed, but (and it is a curious proof how religious fanatics in all climate discriminate on these occasions) the mosques, colleges and hospitals were to be spared. "After the Tigris was rendered red with the blood of the inhabitants of Baghdad, says Sherif Uddin, the air began to be tainted with their corpses," and Taimur moved away to pay his devotions at the tomb of Imam Abu Hanifa, founder of one of the four great Muhammedan sects. He also attacked Syria, then in the hands of the Sultans of Egypt and took Damascus and other of the great towns in Upper Syria. In this town, Damascus, Taimur orders that two magnificent Mausoleums should be built over the sepulchres of two of the wives of Muhammad. This was done in twenty-five days. He remarks to his officers that Damascus was the head-quarters of the Ommeyade Conspiracy which broke the unity of Islam seven centuries previously. The soldiers accept this as a hint and promptly sack the place. A fire finally bursts out which caused immense destruction in the town. When he learns of this fire Taimur takes immediate steps to preserve the famous mosque of *the Ommeyades from the fire, but though the roof was made of wood covered with lead, instead of being varnished, God made his wrath appear against these people; for notwithstanding the soldiers' endeavours to quench it, they could not hinder the Eastern Minaret of this mosque being reduced to ashes, though it was built of stone; whereas the Minaret of Arolls, otherwise named Minar Beiza, remained safe, on which the Mussulmans believe, that the Lord Messiah Jesus, on whom, as on our Prophet, may blessings and salvation be showered, will descend from Heaven, when He shall come to judge both the living and the dead. And what was most miraculous is, that this latter Minaret, though built of wood, and plastered over with lime on the outside, remained entire, while all Damascus was burnt down, and the immense riches within it pillaged, and sacked, as well as the rest of Syria. But Taimur's greatest enemy was the Ottoman Turk. In his Memoirs these are described as inhabiting lands,

* Petis de la Croix, Vol. II, p. 78.

* Petis de la Croix, Vol. II. p. 201.

the Asylum for all the robbers of Asia. In his campaigns he harried Asia Minor through and through, taking by sap and storm Smyrna which he describes as the head-quarters of the Christians. At last he and Bajazet meet on the field of Angora. Before the Tartar's impetuosity the Turk went down, Bajazet became a prisoner (whether carried about in a cage or not seems doubtful, but he certainly died within a very few months) and for three years Taimur is the undoubted head of Asia. These three years he utilised in a triumphal return to Samarkand; and in an overhauling of the administration at head-quarters with the natural consequence of a number of executions, grand marriage festivities, at which wine freely flowed (after these are over Taimur prohibited its use throughout his dominions), the getting ready of an expedition against China, its setting out and the death of the great conqueror at Otrar not far from the Modern Kashgar in 1405. As to the state of Asia when he came to the throne and at his death his panegyrist tells us: * "In the beginning of Taimur's rise Asia was in the possession of usurpers, who had raised themselves to sovereignty, either by the extinction of the race of former Kings and Emperors, or by intrigues or revolts; but as the world could not be peaceably governed by so many Sovereigns, there were continual wars amongst them, and the poor people were driven into great extremities. Virtue and tranquility were banished the places which robbers only possessed; security was no longer to be met with on the high ways, which were full of thieves; and in fine, everything was in confusion and disorder. The world might then be well compared to a human body, which being infected with some corrupt matter, necessarily falls sick, and can receive no benefit but from a strong medicine, which purges out the cause of the disease; and yet this purgation cannot be undertaken without some inconveniences which may arise from a depraved appetite. In the same manner, God, who was pleased to purge the world, made use of a medicine, which was both sweet and bitter, to wit, the clemency and the wrath of incomparable Taimur; and to that effect, inspired in him an ambition to conquer all Asia, and to expel the several tyrants thereof. He established peace and security in this part of the world ; so that a single man might carry a silver basin filled with gold from the east of Asia to the west. But yet he could not accomplish this great affair without bringing in some measure upon the places he conquered, destruction, captivity, and plunder, which are the concomitants of victory."

* Petis de la Croix, Vol. II, pp. 368—369.

The last words are very true. Doubtless the net result was the putting down of an immense amount of local and petty tyranny ; but it was at an awful expenditure of human life, and only for a time. For with his death, the fabric fell to pieces. His descendants grabbed any part of his extensive kingdom they could seize, and within a very few years Transoxiana, Persia, and all the countries round became again just what they were before. Another century and more had to elapse before the three great Powers, the Osmanli Turk, the Persian Sufis and the Indian Moghul brought these lands under the centralised rule of great states. Large parts of Taimur's kingdoms never belonged to any of these great powers, but the richest and the more civilised parts, almost all, were comprised in one of the three.

---

CHAPTER XIV.

WITH Taimur comes the parting of the ways in Central Asia. The Western Tartar has become completely Muhammedan ; he has no objection to living in towns ; the term Tajik, a town dweller, is no more a term of reproach. On the other hand, the Eastern Tartar, whether nominally a Muhammedan or not, still holds by his ancient ways. He still wanders over the steppes and obstinately refuses to settle in towns. The Western Tartar is chiefly to be found in Mawer-an-Naher (Transoxiana), where he has taken the place largely of the earlier Persian inhabitant ; there he has settled, and there save to conquer he will stay ; power becomes more concentrated ; all the making of a state politic, large or small, is to be found in this part of Western Asia; beyond, everywhere up to the Arctic Ocean, to the Himalayas and the Pacific, the desert and the dweller therein. In the one small region some order, some civilisation; beyond, still primitive organisations, almost absolute chaos.

---

CHAPTER XV.

CHRISTIANITY, MUHAMMEDANISM AND THE MONGOLS.

GIBBON has in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" told us how it was that the religion of Christ from being that of a few Galilean peasants became the state religion of Imperial Rome. It must have often struck those who think about such matters that it is a remarkable fact that Christianity has never far gone beyond its great victories over the Roman Empire. Nation after nation of the Goths, indeed, and other invaders of that Empire, came one by one under its influence and as a part of that influence, became Christian. When the old Pagan World Empire of Rome became changed into the Holy Western Empire and the Eastern Empire, new races coming in contact with the former became after a struggle longer or shorter Christians. Goths, Franks, Germans and later the Saxons and Slavs one by one gave up their heathen gods and accepted the religion and theology of the Western Empire. In the Byzantine Empire, Christianity before the time of Justinian, began to influence the Slavs of the South of Russia, and little by little penetrated into the depths of that great country. On the other hand in the Eastern part of that Empire, in Syria where Christianity was first born, and in Egypt, the religion of Christ went down before that of Muhammad and ceased in the seventh century to be that of the people generally. To sum up the position in one word, Christianity became at the beginning of the fourth century the religion of the Roman Empire. Ever since it has been the religion, speaking in a broad sense, of that Empire and the races more or less incorporated within it, and of them only. Since that time its conquests have been comparatively insignificant. The crusades did not bring any large access of converts for the cross; in modern times a sort of very corrupt Christianity has been introduced amongst the Aborigines of the new world and amongst negro slaves forcibly imported there and their descendants. Where Spaniards and Portuguese have gone as conquerors, they have forced conquered races more or less to accept Christianity, though this generally has only been a change of name and not of belief. In the last century all over the world Missionaries, both Catholics and Protestants, have succeeded in making and in obtaining a certain number of converts, in some places such as the South Seas, indeed converting whole races. But looking at affairs on the whole, progress has been very slow, and since the days that the Teutonic Knights spread Christianity by the sword in Brandenburg, Prussia, Poland and Lithuania, one cannot lay one's hands on any great national spread of Christianity. Far opposite has been the case of Muhammedanism. Within a hundred years from the day that Muhammad fled from Mecca, the Eastern part of the Byzantine Empire as well as the whole of Northern Africa changed its faith from Christianity to Muhammedanism, and so likewise Persia, converted from fire-worship, became the permanent abode of Islam. Since then, time after time it has conquered and become the national religion of great races. The Turks first of all, then the other Mongols of Central Asia, have successively become the followers of the Prophet. In the West it is even at the present day spreading over the whole of Central Africa driving out Fetishism, Cannibalism and Paganism of every sort. In India, although not the creed of the majority, it was for hundreds of years before the British became rulers of the country, the predominant political force. It has spread far and wide in the Islands of the Malay Archipelago, and even now is rapidly becoming the religion of a great part of China. Why is this, and why in particular for this is the matter which chiefly concerns us, did the Mongols become Muhammedans and not Christians. Probably during the twelfth and first half of the thirteenth century there were as many Christians in Mongol lands as Muhammedans, and the Mongol relations with the children of Islam were those of incessant war. Is there something in Muhammedanism which is not to be found in Christianity which specially appeals to the peoples of hot countries. To answer these questions it is necessary to refer to history. Christianity, as taught in the Synoptic gospels, is simple and easy to be understood. The keynote is to be found in the nearness of the Kingdom of Heaven; repentance, goodness, purity of heart, self-denial, the nobility of the human soul, such are the main doctrines taught therein. Christ's personality as a teacher and master pervades in the first three gospels everywhere; of metaphysical theology there is hardly a trace. When, however, the Apostle Paul carried the gospel of Christ from Palestine to the larger regions of the Roman Empire, when the good tidings went from the Jews to the Gentiles, in order to appeal to Greek intellect and Greek thought, they were necessarily clothed in Greek form and found Greek expression. Excessive clothing largely hid the life within, and instead of the Galilean teacher, essentially a man amongst men, though greater in goodness and purity than all others, was to be found the metaphysical conception of the Logos, the incarnate word, and with it Platonism in all its myriad modifications. Instead of history one was offered philosophy. In order to conquer the Greek mind, which in the second century of the Roman Empire was really the thinking mind of the Empire, it was, as I said, necessary for Christianity to become metaphysical. In order to conquer the Roman Empire, Christianity had to be organised as the Empire itself, and so the Christian Dogma was of Greece and Christian Administration of Rome. When Constantine made Christianity the state religion of the Roman Empire, he really consecrated what had been established beforehand, i.e., the Roman system of prætors and their subordinates in the Ecclesiastical world, Archbishops and Bishops and Priests taking the same place in the Church Hierarchy that Roman officials did in the state world. Athanasius sums up the beliefs of the Church in a creed purely adapted to, and appealing to Greek minds. Constantine at the Council of Nice settles the administrative rules of the religious world as he would that of a new province. So Christianity became Roman in administration and Greek in doctrine, so as to appeal on its theoretic side to persons trained in Greek systems of thought, and on its practical side, to those brought up under the Roman methods of governing. Church Christianity never has, and never seems likely to exceed, the limits then laid down. If there is to be a Christianity of the future away from the races governed by the ideas of Greece and Rome, it can only be by a return to the elementary doctrines of the first three gospels and of a complete abandonment of the gigantic structure of doctrine and rule which saw the light in the second and third centuries of the Christian era. Now if we return to the formulæ of this Church Christianity we see how very complex they are. In this they are strongly contrasted with the simplicity of Islam. Compare the Athanasian creed with the Kalima* in the Koran. There can be no comparison as regards the greater directness, humanity, and I may say, comprehensibility of the latter. I may as well point out here that orthodox Christianity was closely connected after the time of Constantine with the existence of the Roman Empire. Orthodoxy and good feeling to the Empire went hand in hand. Arianism was combated by Roman officials as being a religion of particularism as much as it was fought as a heresy by the spiritual heads of the Catholic Church. The more Catholic the race became, the greater was its assimilation with the Roman Empire and the less its assertion of national existence. The various Christian sects which arose in the East and which were more or less driven out to the Roman Empire rapidly degenerated into something not well distinguishable from absolute Paganism. The Jacobites of the Nile and the Nestorians of the East both living beyond the pale of that Empire sank lower and lower in the scale, until between them and the Pagans amongst which they were found but little distinction could be made. Let us turn

---

* NOTE The Kalima is the first Sura of the Koran. It is thus translated by Sale: Praise be to God the Lord of all creatures; the most merciful the King of the day of Judgment. Thee do we worship and of Thee do we lay assistance. Direct us in the right way, in the way of those to whom Thou hast been gracious: not of those against whom Thou art incensed nor of those who go astray.

now from Christianity to Muhammedanism, from Alexandria, Athens and Rome to Mecca. I do not say from Jerusalem, for that town, though in the centre of the intellectual ferment of the human mind in the East, was never the centre of theological Christianity. In Palestine the Ebionite or the Gnostic was to be found; but rarely the Orthodox Christian. Jerusalem never really lowered her head to Athens or Rome; she never accepted Greco-Roman Christianity.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE paganism everywhere prevalent in Arabia had nothing to do with the paganism of Greece and Rome. It sprang from the same sources as that of other Semitic races. Of recent years the reading world has been taught by a small band of scholars how Judaism, as we know it, was itself evoked out of early Semitic paganism, how the worship of sacred trees, of high places and of elemental powers, of tribal gods (the Elohim) and a tribal god (Jehovah) preceded the Monotheism which became the cornerstone of Judaism. While a part of the Hebrews had thus from Pagans become Theists, their Arabian brethren continued their old worship and till the time of Muhammad remained Pagans. Amongst them, however, was a large Jewish community, of whom a considerable number were Proselytes. The feeling of kinship between Hebrew and Arab has always been strong. The preaching of Muhammad came to the Arabs much as the preaching of one of the great prophets came to the Hebrews of old. He found a soil largely prepared. Although the mass of the people were idolators, still the leaven of Monotheism was there. And this leaven, under his powerful preaching, as was the case again and again in the time of the Hebrews, temporarily leavened the whole lump. The wandering Arabs, it is known, even to this day, have not entirely given up old heathen practices. Muhammad's success, however, was greater than that of any of the Hebrew prophets. Like them, he was without honour, or a long time in his own country; but unlike them before he died, he had become the object of veneration and affection to his fellow countrymen. His formulæ were as simple as those of Jeremiah and John the Baptist. Repentance, belief in one God, good works, these were the sum of his doctrine. In respect of social matters his teaching and that of the Christian Church differed in two important respects. These differences have largely modified the world's history and certainly have had much to do with the respective spheres of influence of the two religions. The Christian Church prohibits polygamy, permits the use of intoxicating liquors; Muhammad permitted the former, prohibited the latter. Those, who look to climate and physical environment as the main causes of institutions may explain these prohibitions and permissions by a reference to the difference in climate between Europe and Arabia. But whether this be wholly true or not, that it is partially true is undoubted, the result has been that the East accepts Muhammedanism, Europe Christianity—Muhammedanism spread over countries where polygamy had always been practised and where wine was the drink of the few. In certain countries such as parts of Persia, and in the Steppes of Central Asia, where wine has been procurable, the Prophet's injunction as to its non-use has been honoured rather in the breach than in the observance. But so in Christian Europe monogamy has as its concomitant the most extensive prostitution.

Accordingly in the East Muhammedanism had certain points greatly in its favour in its rivalry with Christianity, viz., its permission of polygamy, its simplicity of creed, and its not basing itself on Greek metaphysics. Add to this that the so-called Christians of the East were not only degraded in belief and life, but were also as a community an oppressed and too often a cowardly race, having no fight of any sort in them, and the reasons seem fairly clear why the Mongols, a race of savage virile conquerors, should prefer Islam to the Christianity with which they came in contact. As in the case of any religion, however, which becomes that of a race different from that amongst which it originated, Islam, as accepted by the Mongols, has special points of difference from the Islam of the Arabs.

Perhaps the most striking point in the beliefs of the Muhammedan of Central Asia is his great respect for Khwajehs or holy men. In Arabia beyond the mausoleum of the Prophet, shrines sanctified by holy men being buried in them are few. In Persia and the Dôab of the Euphrates and Tigris, they are commoner, but still they are rare and are only those of shining lights of Islam, such as the shrines at Kerbela and Meshed. But everywhere in Central Asia are to be found the tombs of the prophets and saints. Around the tomb springs up a local cult, much as in Catholic Europe there are everywhere special cults of the local patron saint. Akbar in his early days in India is ever to be found travelling, sometimes on foot, to Ajmir where was the mausoleum of the Chisti family, and to this day Muhammedans have tombs such as Nizam Uddin's at Delhi to which they make pilgrimage just as the Hindu does to his holy places. Whether this partly arises from the influence of Buddhism it is hard to say. It is certainly not a characteristic of Shamanism—the old Mongol religion.

One great point of the Mongol character is that he was not in his native steppes so bound up in his religion as other races. The Hindu, for instance, from birth until death, from morning till night, is wrapped up in ritual performance and religious (or superstitious) observance. Every meal that he eats is a religious act, every sight that he sees has some religious significance. So too is the case with the native of West Africa. But the Mongol of Central Asia, though he had his omens and dreams, his witches and witch-finders, lived on the whole free from much religious restraint. Nor has Muhammedanism caused him to be much more bound. He has accepted the Muhammedan creed; but only very partially the Muhammedan social system, which accompanied it, and his life has retained as its basis much of the social law of his own steppes, just as in Northern Europe Christianity is a faith, but has not had any great part in social customs and life, indeed save so far as it has harmonised with the life it found existing.

---

PART II.

CHAPTER I.

FROM THE SACK OF DELHI BY TAIMUR TO THE BATTLE OF PANIPUT.

THE darkest period of the Muhammedan rule in Delhi was from A.D. 1393 to A.D. 1526. After its sack all the riches which had been stored up in that capital were gone, and most of the citizens, the people who had made the city what it was, had been carried off by the conqueror. Those who had not been so carried away were dispersed and did not return to Delhi, for instead of this city remaining the capital of India, it sunk to being the head-quarters of a Princelet. Rulers there were in Delhi indeed throughout the fifteenth century but their rule did not stand comparison as regards extent of territory ruled over or strength of administration with that of other Indian powers. I have already stated that after this invasion we find that for many years almost the only coinage coined in the Delhi Mint was of copper. The gold and silver had seemingly almost entirely disappeared.

To the self-complacent conqueror's mind he was the first of Muhammedans carrying on war against infidels. But to the Indian Muhammedan he appeared in a very different light. The Hindu Rulers in Upper India save in Rajputana were not at the time above the rank of petty feudal chiefs, and a defeat of a few of them had little effect on Hinduism in India. But the sack of Delhi and the overthrow of the one great Muhammedan Kingdom of Hindustan wrought much harm to Indian Muhammedanism. No wonder then that warriors fighting against Taimur are given the rank of martyrs by the Indian Muhammedan historians.

During the two months that followed Taimur's departure, the neighbourhood of Delhi and all those territories over which his armies had passed were visited with pestilence (waba*) and famine.

Thereafter Ikbal Khan, an Indian Muhammedan nobleman—Sultan Mahmud, the titular sovereign, had fled to Gujarat—took upon himself the Government of Delhi, and in a short time Siyi, one of its three forts, began to be populated again. In A.D. 1401 the fugitive Sultan Mahmud returned and again became nominal ruler. He was, however, but a faineant king, ever in the hand of some master of the Palace, and so little respect did he get that when Ikbal Khan, the then real ruler of Delhi, took him along with him to fight Sultan Ibrahim, the ruler of Jaunpore, we are told “When the two armies were near to each other and the battle was imminent, Sultan Mahmud left the army of Ikbal Khan on the pretence of hunting and went to join Sultan Ibrahim, but Ibrahim paid him not the slightest attention, so he departed and went to the district of Kanouj. At Kanouj all ranks of people joined the Sultan and the scattered guards and dependants rallied round him.† The Sultan himself was content with this district.” After Ikbal Khan's death in battle in 1405 A.D. a deputation came to Sultan Mahmud asking him to take up the Government of Delhi again. This he did, and shortly after Kanouj fell into the hands of the ruler of Jaunpore. The rest of Sultan Mahmud's reign is one of confused warfare. We read in the Tarik-i-Mubarik Shahi, “The whole business of the State had fallen into the greatest disorder; the Sultan gave no heed to the duties of his station and had no care for the permanency of the throne;‡ his whole time was devoted to pleasure and debauchery.” In 1412 A.D. he died and with him came to an end the house of Tughlak.

After his death a Pathan nobleman, Doulat Khan Lodi, became ruler for a short time, but soon gave place to Khizr Khan, whom Indian historians name as the founder of the Sayid dynasty. Three feeble rulers succeeded one another at Delhi, the last Sayid king ceasing to reign in 1450 A.D. The boundaries of the kingdom were somewhere about Biana (near the modern Agra) on the South, the Ganges on the East and the Sutlej on the West. Everywhere the Hindus had profited by Taimur's invasion. Gwalior had fallen into their hands, not to be retaken till the next century. Katehr, modern Rohilkund, became entirely Hindu. Muhammedan historians in hyperbolic paragraphs tell us of great triumphs of Islam militant, of wholesale defeat of the Hindu infidels, but the truth is that the latter had never since Muhammad Ghor's invasion at the end of the twelfth century been so strong. Temporary raids by Muhammedan rulers might succeed, but permanent conquests there were none. The author of the Tarik-i-Mubarak Shahi states of Sayid Khizr Khan, the founder of the Sayid dynasty which succeeded the Tughlak, that one proof of his being a Sayid was that he was generous, brave, merciful, considerate, true to his word and kind. Sayids are descendants of the Prophet through Fatima, his daughter. I am afraid the title is often taken by those who have but little right to the name. The author just mentioned says that the virtues which Sayid Khizr Khan is stated to have had were conspicuous in the Prophet. This is true enough, and although the theory of hereditary qualities may be pressed too far, it is no doubt that many of the Sayids in India as well as elsewhere were and are men of the highest quality. In afterdays the Sayids of Baraha (in the Punjab) will be found as the leading warriors of Islam in many a hard fought fight. Khizr Khan died in 1421 A.D. and was succeeded by his son Mubarak Shah

* NOTE.—This word waba is used by Muhammedan historians for the disease known to us as plague.

† Elliott, Vol. IV, p. 39.

‡ Elliott, Vol. V, p. 43.

---

CHAPTER II.

MUBARAK SHAH reigned from 1421 to 1433. During his reign the boundary of the Delhi Kingdom stretched to the South not further than Gwalior and Etawah. On the East it was bounded by the newly-founded kingdom of Jaunpore in which was comprised nearly the whole of modern Oudh; over the Punjab and the Subah of Mooltan its hold was but slight. Indeed, even round about Delhi, the King seemed to have but comparatively little power and had constantly to journey hither and thither to collect arrears of revenue. Taimur's invasion and constant raids by local rulers had brought Lahore to such a state of ruin that when the Sultan entered it in the year 1421, "no living thing except the owl of ill omen had its abode there." The King's two chief enemies were Jusrath Khokha (a Khakkar) of the Upper Punjab and Sheikh Ali, one of the nobles of Shah Rukh's son of Taimur, reigning at Kabul. The historian in common with most Indian Muhammedans looked on the Moghuls as no better than infidels. In one place he writes* "Sheikh Ali then gave his cursed followers permission to take possession of the fort of Tulamba near Mooltan. Next day all the Mussalmans became prisoners of the unclean ruthless infidels. Although many good men of the place were Imams, Saiyids and Kazis, no respect for the Mussalman religion, no fear of God, could restrain that accursed wretch, devoid alike of feeling and shame. Women, youths and little children were all dragged to his house. Some of the men were killed and some were set at liberty." And then again† "next day the accursed Sheikh Ali made all the Mussulmans of the city of Lahore, both men and women, prisoners. This wretched graceless fellow had no better occupation or object than to lay waste the seats of Islam and to make Mussulmans captive." The Sultan's own life seems to have been alternately spent in roaming about the country in search of revenue and fighting with his enemies, or in dissipations at his capital. Like many of his Mussulman predecessors he determined to build a city of his own and accordingly laid the foundation of a town he named Mobarakabad. The Mussulman historian punning on the word says that Mobarakabad should have been Kharababad (the city of evil instead of blessing). It was during the construction of this town (not far from the modern Delhi) that he met with his death. Sarwarul Mulk, one of his chiefs, had been both Dewan and Vazir. The King had thought fit to take the office of Dewan from him, in revenge for which he arranged his sovereign's murder. The Sultan was slain at Mobarakabad where he was watching over the progress of the building by a number of hired murderers. Khizr Khan's grandson Muhammad Bin Farid Shah was put on the throne in his place. The Vazir did not long survive his victim as the King whom he put up as a puppet conspired against him and after a short time got together a party stronger than that standing by Sarwarul Mulk. The consequence was the latter's death and the assumption of rule by Muhammad Bin Farid. His inglorious reign lasted for ten years. On every side his nobles set up as independent sovereigns on their own behalf. He himself was quite happy dissipating in Delhi. On his death Sultan Ala Uddin, grandson of Mubarak Shah, ascended the throne. He was but the shadow of a shadow. After a nominal reign of seven years he quite contentedly abandoned the throne and settled in Budaon. In his place Buhlol Lodi, the most powerful chief in the kingdom and the Viceroy of the Punjab, sat on the throne of Dehli. With his reign the stage of the absolute degradation of Delhi came to an end, and during his reign and the reign of his two successors (the three are known as the Lodi dynasty), the fortunes of Delhi began little by little to rise from the absolutely nothing to which they had sunk.

* Elliott, Vol. IV. p. 73.

† Elliott, Vol. IV, p. 76.

CHAPTER III.

LODI is the name of an Afghan family, the members of which have for centuries been warriors and rulers in India. Buhlol Lodi, the founder of the dynasty, was himself a relation of Sultan Shah Lodi, a Jagirdar of Sirhind. It is said that he first made his fortune in trade. One of the kings of Delhi assigned a Jagir to him in payment of a bill for horses which seems to have been the foundation of his subsequent success.

In the Tarik-i-Khan Jahan Lodi we hear the following story :—

“Malik Buhlol went to see a Darwesh who made predictions. He was accompanied by his two intimate friends, and after having treated the Darwesh with every courtesy, sat down. That person, who was abstracted from worldly thoughts, asked ‘if any one of them was able to buy the Kingdom of Delhi from him for 2,000 tankahs.* Malik Buhlol had 1,300 tankahs in his purse, which he took out and placed before the saint and said: 'This is all I possess.' That worthy person consented to accept the sum so proffered and said: 'May the Empire of Delhi be fortunate to you.' When his two associates began to ridicule his superstition, Malik Buhlol said: 'One of two things must happen: if the event be successful I shall have made a good bargain; if not, in the day of judgment there are rewards for good deeds done to darweshes.'"

His rival to the supreme authority in the time of Sultan Ala Uddin was one Hamid Khan, the King's Vizir. We are told the following story as to how he managed to turn Hamid Khan out of private life and seize the supreme power for himself:—

† "One day Hamid Khan gave a grand entertainment, and invited many nobles as his guests. Sultan Buhlol, who was one of the party, had instructed his Afghans to behave in a foolish and indecorous manner during Hamid Khan's feast, so that he might look on them as a set of idiots, and ceasing to regard them with any apprehension, might pay no further attention to them. When the Afghans went into Hamid Khan's presence, they acted in an unusual and strange manner. Some fastened their shoes to their girdles, some placed their shoes in a recess above Hamid Khan's head. Hamid Khan inquired what this meant. They answered: 'We are taking precautions against thieves.' After a short time the Afghans said to Hamid Khan: 'Your carpet is wonderfully coloured; if you give us each a blanket from it we will send it as a rarity to our native land of Roh, to make caps for our children that the inhabitants of the world may know that we are in the service of Hamid Khan and are treated with much dignity, honor and respect.' Hamid Khan smiled and said in reply: 'I will make you presents of the most costly articles for rarities.' And as they were bringing round trays containing perfumes, the Afghans licked the scent bottles, and ate the flowers.

* Elliott, Vol. V, p. 72.

† Elliott, Vol. V, pp. 76-77.

They opened the leaves which covered the pan. First they ate the lime, and when this had heated their mouths they chewed the pan afterwards, and in other respects conducted themselves in an extraordinary manner. Hamid Khan asked Malik Buhlol: 'Why do they act thus?' He replied: 'They are a set of clowns, and have associated but little with men; they only know how to eat and die.' It became Buhlol's custom to bring some of these men whenever he went to see Hamid Khan; but the greater portion of his attendants remained standing without. On one occasion, when Hamid Khan was feasting Malik Buhlol, the Afghans, in obedience to secret instructions received from Malik Buhlol, beat the door-keepers and forced their way in saying: 'We are all likewise servants of Hamid Khan; why should we be prevented from coming to salute him?' When a tumult and disturbance had arisen, Hamid Khan asked the reasons of it. They, as they were entering, abused Malik Buhlol, and said to the minister 'We are just as much your servants as he is; he comes in, and should not we?' When Hamid Khan directed that they should be admitted, the Afghans crowded in, and two of them placed themselves near every servant of Hamid Khan. When the eating part of the entertainment was over, and many of Hamid Khan's men had gone out, Kutb Khan Lodi drew forth a chain from his bosom, and laid it before Hamid Khan saying: 'The best thing for you will be to retire for a short time from public life. As I have eaten your salt, I do not intend to put you to death.' After this he caused Hamid Khan to be seized, and gave him in charge to his officers."

Thus Malik Buhlol took possession of Delhi, without hindrance or opposition. His reign lasted for 37 years from 1451 to 1488, and seems to have been prosperous. His character is very favourably estimated by Ferishta who says: "Buhlo! Lodi was estimated a virtuous and a mild Prince, executing justice to the utmost of his knowledge, and treating his courtiers rather as companions than subjects. When he obtained the crown he divided the public treasure among his friends, and could be seldom prevailed on to ascend the throne, saying: 'That it was enough for him that the world knew he was King without his making a display of royalty.' He was extremely temperate in his diet, and seldom ate at home. Though a man of no great literary acquirements himself, he was fond of the company of learned men, whom he rewarded according to their merits. He placed great reliance on the courage of his Moghul troops, on which account they met with such encouragement among his relations and courtiers that it is estimated there were nearly 20,000 Moghuls in the service of the Government during his reign. He was a wise and brave Prince and personally well acquainted with Muhammedan Law. He also studied the best institutes for maintaining order in his Government, which he invariably adopted. He was prudent, and, above all things, deprecated hurrying matters of State; and indeed, his conduct throughout life sufficiently evinced how much he practised this quality."*

His life as King was chiefly spent in constant conflict with the kingdom of Jaunpore known as the Eastern Kingdom. Roughly speaking the dividing line between the two powers of Jaunpore and Delhi was the Ganges. It would be unprofitable to go into the endless wars described in the histories of the times. Suffice it to say that after much fighting the Jaunpore King was conquered, and a relation of the King named Barbak made ruler of Jaunpore.

It is of interest to note the great influence which the queen mothers of Jaunpore had over their sons' kingdom. Indeed, one of the most persistent facts to be noticed throughout the history of all Muhammedan Rulers in India is to note the enormous influence which their female relations, generally their wives and mothers, have had over the conduct of the Rulers. Their influence, I may say, has hardly ever been exercised for good, and under the Harem system it is very difficult to conceive how it can be. Ignorant as such women must be, living out of the world, even if they had the best intentions, which they generally have not, their ideas and plans are necessarily based largely on imaginary whims. The sanctity of the Harem has been a standing feature of original life as far back as the days of Darius, the enemy of Alexander ; and Eastern Monarchs, who have had little scruple at violating everything else have often hesitated to violate its sacredness.

---

* Elliott, Vol. IV, pp. 91-92.

Besides Ferishta, Abdulla in his Tarik-i-Daudi gives Malik Buhlol the highest of character. He says :* “ Sultan Buhlol was, indeed, a king who fostered religion, and evinced courage and generosity. His mercy and benevolence were habitual : he observed the rules of honesty, and had exceeding respect for the law, to the injunctions of which he strictly adhered in all his undertakings. He spent most of his time in the assemblies of the wise and in the society of holy men and made special inquiries respecting the poor and necessitous. He never turned away a suppliant ; and he read his prayers in public five times every day. He devoted excessive care to the administration of justice ; himself heard the petitions of his subjects and left them not to be disposed of by his ministers. He was wise, experienced, considerate, kind, friendly, condescending and just. Whatever came into his possession, in money, goods, or new parganas, he distributed it all among his troops, and reserved nothing whatever for himself. He accumulated no treasure, and executed his kingly functions without parade and ostentation. At the time of his meals he satisfied himself with farinaceous food ; but any one who entered might partake of other viands. In his social meetings he never sat on a throne, and would not allow his nobles to stand, and even during public audiences he did not occupy the throne, but seated himself upon a carpet. Whenever he wrote a farman to his nobles, he addressed them as ‘ Masnad Ali,’ and if at any time they were displeased with him, he tried so hard to pacify them that he would himself go to their houses, ungird his sword from his waist, and place it before the offended party : nay, he would sometimes even take off his turban from his head, and solicit forgiveness, saying : ‘ If you think me unworthy of the station I occupy choose some one else, and bestow on me some other office.’ He maintained a brotherly intercourse with all his chiefs and soldiers. If any one was ill, he would himself go and attend on him. Before he ascended the throne, it was the custom in Dehli to distribute, every third day, sherbat, pan leaves, sugarcandy and sweetmeats. But Sultan Buhlol put an end to this, and positively declined to maintain the practice, observing that, with respect of Afghans, if one poor man should die, a hundred thousand of his tribe would come forward, and how could he provide for such a multitude, and satisfy them? He was exceedingly bold, and on the day of battle, immediately he saw the enemy appear, he would dismount from his horse, fall on his knees, and pray for the success of Islam and the safety of Mussalmans, and confess his own helplessness. From the day that he became King, no one achieved a victory over him; nor did he once leave the field of battle until he had gained the day, or been carried off wounded: or, from the first he avoided an engagement."

* Elliott, Vol. IV, pp. 436-437.

CHAPTER IV.

AFTER Buhlol Lodi came Sultan Sikander. Before his accession to the throne he was called Nizam Khan. A curious story told of him is to be found in Elliott's translation of Tarik-i-Daudi. It runs as follows:—

*" Sheikh Hasan, the grandson of Sheikh Abu Lala, whose memory is revered in Rapri, was captivated by his appearance. This Sheikh was one of the most distinguished men of the period. One winter day, Prince Nizam Khan was sitting in his private chamber, when Sheikh Hasan was seized with a desire of beholding him, and he found no difficulty in reaching him, on account of the respect in which men of his pure mode of life are held. Sultan Sikander was much astonished at seeing him enter, and asked him how he had come in without permission in spite of the door-keepers. The Sheikh answered: 'You know best how and when I came.' The Sultan said: 'You consider yourself fond of me?' He said: 'I cannot hinder myself from being so.' The Sultan ordered him to come forward: he did so, and there was a stove before the Sultan: the Sultan placed his hand on the Sheikh's head, and pressed it towards the burning coals ; notwithstanding which, the Sheikh did not make the slightest movement or resistance. They remained in this position for a short time, when Mubarak Khan Lohani arrived : he wondered much at what he saw, and asked who that person (the Sheikh) was. The Sultan replied that it was Sheikh Hasan. Mubarak Khan said : ‘ O man who fearest not God, what are you doing ? Sheikh Hasan has suffered no damage or injury from the fire ; tremble, lest you yourself should.’ The Sultan said : ‘ He calls himself my admirer.’ Mubarak Khan answered : ‘ You ought to be thankful for his doing so, and that you are pleasing in the sight of so holy a man : if you would obtain felicity in this world and the next, obey him.’ Prince Nizam Khan then withdrew his hand from the Sheikh’s neck ; and everyone saw that, notwithstanding the dreadful heat of the fire, neither the face nor hair of the Sheikh had been injured. In spite of all this, the Sultan ordered the Sheikh to be chained, neck and foot, and cast into a dungeon. This was also done ; and a week afterwards they informed Sultan Sikander that Sheikh Hasan was dancing in the bazar ; he ordered him to be seized and brought before him. When he came into the presence, the Sultan said to him : ‘ You call yourself my admirer ; why have you escaped from the captivity in which I placed you ?’ Sheikh Hasan answered : ‘ I did not do so of my own accord ; my grandfather, Sheikh Abu Lala, led me forth by the hand.’ The Sultan ordered the room in which the Sheikh had been confined to be inspected ; the door was opened, and the chains found lying on the ground ; and the Sheikh had, nevertheless, been found dancing in the bazar. Thenceforth the Sultan did not treat the Sheikh with disrespect.”

* Elliott, Vol. IV, p. 438.

The same author tells us that this Sultan desired to make a wholesale massacre of the Hindoos who had assembled at the great fair at Thanesar. One of his courtiers requested him to consult the learned men, and on his doing so, he was told that such a course would be exceedingly improper ; thereupon he ungraciously yielded. Wonderful stories are told, as may be expected, of his bravery.

The Tarik-i-Daudi describes his character in the following words :—

*“ Sultan Sikander was a most illustrious monarch and of a benevolent disposition ; he was famous for his liberality, honour and politeness ; he had no affection for pomp and ceremonies, and cared not for processions and magnificent dresses. No one who was profligate or a bad character had access to him ; he always associated with men of religion and the virtuous, and was both inwardly pious and outwardly handsome ; he did not give way to his desires, and was exceedingly God-fearing and benevolent to the people. He was very just and courageous, his equity beheld the weak and the strong with the same eye, and he was constantly employed in balancing evidence, deciding suits, arranging the affairs of the Empire, and trying to render his subjects happy ; he personally assisted the wretched. After the afternoon prayer, he went into an assembly of Mullas, and then read the Holy Book. After being present at public prayer and the conclusion of the evening thanksgiving, he was in the habit of going to the Harem, where he remained an hour. He then proceeded to his private chamber, where he seated himself, and remained awake the entire night, but slept at midday. He generally preferred the night for listening to the petitions of the needy ; he also devoted a portion of it to regulating the affairs of the Empire, and in causing farmans to be written to the governors of provinces and letters to the monarchs of the time. Seventeen learned men of tried merit were constantly with him in his private apartment. After midnight he was in the habit of calling for food, when these seventeen learned men, after washing their hands, seated themselves in front of the Sultan, who was himself seated on his couch. A large chair was then brought close to the bed, and the different dishes being placed on it the Sultan commenced eating ; food was also placed before the seventeen companions, who were, however, forbidden to partake of it in his presence. When the King had finished they carried their plates away to their houses and ate there. Some writers assert that His Majesty in order to keep himself in health, was then in the habit of secretly drinking wine."

* Elliott, Vol. IV, pp. 445—446.

He is said to have founded mosques throughout his dominion and to have gathered together a large number of wise men to his Capital Agra (this is the first time in history we read of this town being the capital of the Delhi Kingdom). The annual procession of the spear of Salar Masud* was abolished by him throughout his dominion. Women were also forbidden to make pilgrimages to tombs, and we also read that he put a stop to the Moharram Tazia processions, which, although nominally Muhammedan, are really associated with older Pagan worship.

Barbak Shah, who had been made by Sikander's father, Malik Buhlol, the King of Jaunpore, more than once rebelled against Mubarak Shah. In one of the battles between the two a Kalendar appeared and promised victory to Sikander. The latter turning away with disgust, the Kalendar enquired the reason only, whereupon the Sultan said: "When there is strife between two parties of the religion of Islam, you ought not to side with one, but to say that the victory will remain with those whose success will produce the greatest benefit to religion, and you ought to solicit the Almighty to grant victory to him who will treat the servants of the Lord best." Such sentiments quoted by a courtly historian—all historians in the East are more or less of this nature—can only raise a smile. History is full, however, not only Indian history, but European history too of fine speeches of this sort. Barbak Shah became a prisoner of Sikander's and the Kingdom of Jaunpore came to an end. Sultan Hussain Shaki, one of the leaders of the revolt in Jaunpore, finally fled to Lakhnauti in Bengal, and both the kingdoms of Jaunpore and Behar fell into Mubarak's hands. In one of the Sultan's expeditions we learn that one of his reasons for not advancing further with a campaign was that opium and poppy-heads had become excessively dear. We recommend this reason to those who think that the eating of opium is a hateful vice * Note.—Salar Masud was a Muhammedan Ghazi, who was killed fighting against Hindus near Bahraich in the 11th century. Hindus, as well as Muhammedans, visit his tomb and commemorate his death by processions.

---

introduced by the English. Other wars of Mubarak's led to the conquest of Biana, Chanderi, Dholpur. At his death the Delhi Empire had again become the foremost in the Upper India, but still it was only one among several. Malwa and Gujarat in the South, Bengal in the East were Muhammedan kingdoms in many ways more prosperous, and two out of the three were richer than Delhi itself. But still then as ever Delhi was the real seat of Empire. He who held Delhi and the Highway from the North-West held potentially if not actually India. Stories of Mobarak Shah's justice are to be found. One such is told in the Tarik-i-Daudi thus :—

* “ One day a Sayid from the district of Ardal which is twenty or thirty kos from Panna on the Agra side, sought redress, because Mian Malik, the Jagirdar of that Pargana, had resumed his land, and withheld it from him. The Sultan commanded Mian Bhua to inquire into the matter and make known who was in the right. This dispute lasted two months ; after which period the Sultan asked : ‘ What has happened to you that you cannot settle this affair ? Until it is answered let no one leave the Court to-day.’ Mian Malik, the Vazir's diwan, and the Ulama, discussed the matter until the third watch of the night, and accounts of what they were doing were constantly sent to the Sultan until the case was determined, and the right discovered to be on the Sayid's side who had been oppressed. The Sultan directed Mian Malik to be asked why he had disobeyed the Sultan's orders by tyrannising over the weak and resuming tenures granted for religious and charitable purposes which he had expressly reserved in all jagir grants. Mian Malik being ashamed hung down his head, and said : ‘ I have committed a fault.’ He was then obliged to repeat this three times, ‘ Malik is guilty and a tyrant and the Sayid is an oppressed person.’ When he had said this three times, the Sultan said : ‘ You have been disgraced in the hall of justice, and that is punishment.’ He then had his jagir taken from him, and he never received another as long as he lived.”

---

* Elliott. Vol. IV, p. 454.

Stories are also told of his and his nobles' generosity. Most of these seem to us Westerns pure acts of folly. Easterns judge what we consider senseless extravagance, as showing great-heartedness. It is useless to argue on such matters. Then as now, and as in the future, the East is still the East and the West is still the West.

In July 1505 a dreadful earthquake took place at Agra. This place is well out of the ordinary Indian earthquake zone, we have no chronicles of the time to tell us what happened in the Himalaya and other hills when Agra suffered so much. Only a small part of human misery and of the destruction brought to man by nature is known, and it is well that it should be so. No human power can strike so hard and so remorselessly as nature herself does, and nowhere is this better known than in the glowing East.

Sikander by the time of his death had practically given the old Delhi Empire in its old boundaries. In the South-East his rule stretched to the borders of Bengal; close to Agra, his capital, he held Dholpur and Chanderi; the Punjab recognised his power, and on the South his rule extended well into hilly Bundelkund. This was the normal extent of Delhi sovereignty prior to the Moghul rule. Bengal which had been under Muhammedan rulers from the beginning of the thirteenth century more or less, had been a separate kingdom from the days of its original conquest. Rajputana had never submitted to Moslem yoke. In the East, Muhammedan rule never till the days of Akbar extended beyond the Kosi River and the Muhammedan kingdoms of the Deccan, Gujarat and Malwa had no connection from their foundation with the Delhi Padshahate, though from time to time the Delhi Emperors made efforts more or less ineffectual to conquer them. But although externally the kingdom was restored internally the fabric was hollow. As to this Erskine writes: * "These extensive possessions, however, though under one king, had no very strong principle of cohesion. The monarchy was a congeries of nearly independent principalities.

---

* Erskine, Vol. I, p, 406.

jagirs and provinces, each ruled by a hereditary chief or by a zemindar or delegate from Delhi, and the inhabitants looked more to their immediate governors, who had absolute power in the province and in whose hands consequently lay their happiness or misery than to a distant and little known sovereign. It was the individual not the law that reigned. The Lodi princes, not merely to strengthen their own power, but from necessity, had in general committed the government of the province, and the chief offices of trust, to their own countrymen, the Afghans; so that men of the Lodi, Fermula and Lohana tribes, held all the principal jagirs, which from the habitual modes of thinking of their race, they considered as their own of right, and purchased by their swords rather than as due to any bounty or liberality on the part of the sovereign." Add to these sentiments of the Muhammedan clan leaders, the dislike in which Sikander was held by the Hindus, a dislike necessarily caused by his policy, for he was an idol breaker and a Kafir persecutor, and one has all the elements of instability. In the East a dynasty rarely gets its roots very deep into national life. A small push and over it goes. Such was the case with the Lodi dynasty. It came to an end in the reign of the next King Sikander's son, Ibrahim; like a house of cards, a slight push and over it went hopelessly and entirely. But only I may say the dynasty. The rule by the heads of the tribes; the decentralising influences in India described above by Erskine corresponding roughly to European feudalism was much harder to overthrow. It was only in the reign of Akbar that after many struggles it was overthrown; and within a century of such overthrow again it raised its head, only to be finally brought into subjection by the strong hand of the British Raj.

Sikander died in A.D. 1517, and was succeeded by his son Ibrahim, the last of the Lodi dynasty. Abdulla, author of the Tarik-i-Daudi, tells us that in his time all the necessaries of life were in great abundance: "One of the most extraordinary phenomena of Sultan Ibrahim's time was that corn, clothes and every kind of merchandise were cheaper than they had ever been known to be in any other reign, except perhaps in the time of Sultan Ala Uddin Khilji; but even that is doubtful. Moreover, in the time of the latter, the cheapness was occasioned by every kind of disgusting interference and oppression and by a hundred thousand enforcements and punishments; whereas the cheapness of this reign was occasioned by abundant harvests. In the time of Sikander also, the markets were very cheap, but still not so much as in time of Ibrahim. Ten maunds of corn could be purchased for one buhloli; five seers of clarified butter and ten yards of cloth could be purchased for the same coin. Everything else was in the same exuberance; the reason of all which was that rain fell in the exact quantity which was needed, and the crops were consequently luxuriant, and produce increased ten-fold beyond the usual proportion. The Sultan likewise issued an edict that his chiefs and nobles of every degree should take nothing but corn in payment of rent, and no money was to be taken from the cultivators on any account. The consequence was that countless quantities of grain accumulated in the several jagirs, and as ready money was only necessary for maintaining the personal expenses of the nobles, they were eager to sell their grain at any price which was procurable. The abundance of God's blessings reached such a height that ten maunds of corn would sell for a buhloli. Gold and silver were only procurable with the greatest difficulty. A respectable man with a family dependent on him might obtain wages at the rate of five tankahs a month, a horseman received from twenty to thirty as his monthly pay. If a traveller wished to proceed from Delhi-Agra, one buhloli would with the greatest ease suffice for the expenses for himself, his horse and escort.

This abundance had nothing to do with good government. The whole history of Ibrahim's reign as told by Muhammedan historians is nothing but a series of internal contests, occasioned in almost all cases by Ibrahim's suspicions and cruelty. In a large country like India, much as in modern Russia, the folly of the rulers, unless coupled with a grinding system of taxation, has but little influence over the happiness or wretchedness of the mass of the people. No amount of oppression at the head-quarters either of the sovereign or of the local government can cause so much misery as universal oppressive imposts. Pope's lines concerning the small part of the ills endured by mankind which kings can either make or cure is not a complete statement of the truth. Acts of tyranny by rulers usually do not spread their baneful influence far; but a wrong fiscal system, the gabelle in France to take a notable instance, crushes the heart out of a country and causes a large part of the ills of human life. I have said that the Muhammedan historians lay the incessant revolts of Ibrahim's reign to the door of his tyranny. But one must remember that these historians wrote after the Lodi dynasty fell, and one must also remember the character of the Delhi rule, as described by Erskine. A series of feudatory chiefs, all more or less struggling for independence on the one hand, and on the other a strong Prince, for there seems to have been no doubt that Ibrahim was a strong Prince and the result, especially when one remembers that the political morality of the age was summed up in doing as much harm to your rival as possible, for otherwise your rival would do as much harm as he could to you, was inevitable that endless trouble should ensue. Louis the XI comes triumphant out of such a strife partly on account of his character, and partly because France was tired of the endless feudal tyranny that prevailed in it in the fifteenth century; but Ibrahim was no Louis the XI, and Hindustan was no France. Ibrahim's first opponent was his own brother Jalal Khan, who on his father's death became the ruler of Jaunpore. Whether Ferishta, who says that he was put on the throne at Jaunpore by disaffected Lodi nobles or the author of the Tarik-i-Salatin Afghana, who says he was sent from Delhi to take possession of the Eastern Kingdom be correct, it is certain that the brothers never lived in amity with each other. Ibrahim first of all tried treachery; sending Haibat Khan (the wolf slayer), seemingly the Achitophel of the time, to induce Jalal Khan to visit him at Delhi. The latter, however, over-acted his part and failed; war then broke out between the brothers. Jalal Khan's cause so far advanced that at one time he was able to lay siege to Agra; but there he was fooled by Malik Adam, the governor, who persuaded him to resign all claims to the Empire and to content himself with the Subah of Kalpi. His best friends then left him; his brother, according to the ordinary standard of Oriental high policy, declined to give him the Subah which he had been promised; and after various adventures he was finally seized by some Gonds, a hill tribe of Central India, and handed over to the Sultan's officers. After having been brought to the Royal Court in order that he might be fully identified, for there have been plenty of Perkin Warbecks in the East, he was put to death.

* Note.—Thomas's note, page 359, and following of his Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, does not help us very much with these buhlolis and tankahs.

Ibrahim got rid of his father's chief minister by the following ingenious device:—

Certain nobles, who were envious of the Mian, counselled the King to erect a building with a subterranean chamber beneath it. When two months had elapsed, and the chamber was thoroughly dry, they filled it with bags of gunpowder. They then procured the release of Mian Bhua and certain other nobles against whom they were plotting, gave them dresses of honour and money, and treated them with such kindness that they banished all apprehension from their minds. One day the King said to them: * "Islam Khan was raised from the dust, and kindly treated by Sultan Sikander; but he had since become apprehensive, and has rebelled and proclaimed open enmity. I pray you to retire to the new house which I have built, sit there and deliberate amongst yourselves what course I ought to follow. I have such confidence in you that I am certain the conclusion you come to will be of benefit to me." They went unsuspectingly to the place, and commenced their consultation. Suddenly the whole place was blown up, and Mian Bhua and all who were there present were scattered as leaves of trees by a gale of wind.

* Elliott, Vol. V. p. 14.

His contemporary of England, Henry the VIII, could not employ the Oriental's methods in order to get himself rid of his father's hated ministers, Empson and Dudley. He had to have recourse to the strong hand of the law. Such in essence is much of the difference between the West and the East. In the West at this time tyranny was everywhere rife; but wherever exercised, it always hid itself under the decorous cover of legal forms, while in the East it stood unabashed; at the outside sheltering itself under some text of the Koran forcibly wrenched out the sacred book to show the fate of the wicked (all chiefs indeed might safely be predicated as wicked in those days).

Ibrahim's most obdurate enemy was Rana Sanga, the chief Rajput ruler of the time, concerning whom I shall say more when I reach the reign of Baber. More than one of the Delhi suspected chiefs accompanied a great expedition into the Rana's country. The Sultan gave orders to Mian Makhun Khan Khanum Farmuli, the Commander-in-Chief, to seize two of the principal of these, Mian Hasan Khan and Mian Maruf Khan, the best way he could and to send them prisoners to him. More than once Mian Makhun tried to do so, but each time he was foiled by these chiefs who had suspected the Sultan's intentions. Finally, one of them Mian Hasan Khan joined Rana Sanga, Mian Maruf refusing to do so, but holding himself apart. But after a battle in which the Delhi troops were defeated though Mian Hasan took no part in it, he again joined the Imperial Army, having treacherously before doing so turned on the troops of the Rajputs who had sheltered him. Such is the story told by Ahmad Yadgar.

It is discredited indeed by Elliott, but seems probable enough. Anyhow, Mian Hasan did not escape from his master, who finally had him murdered at Chanderi. The assassin was rewarded with seven hundred gold pieces by the grateful Sultan as well as by a gift of ten villages in inam (rent free), a circumstance which, as Elliott remarks, is calculated to give us a high idea of the origin of rent-free holdings. Ibrahim's chief and most faithful councillor, so says the historian, was Azam Humayun. He too fell a victim to his master's suspicions. While at the head of an army operating against Gwalior, a fort which many Muhammedan rulers tried to capture but seem never to have succeeded in doing, though they on several occasions seized the lower town, he was duly recalled to Delhi. At a short distance from that town he was met by the King's cup-bearer who deprived him of all that he had, mounted him on a small pony and cast him into a dungeon. He seems to have made no resistance. A dungeon and a grave in the East are practically synonymous, and shortly after being thrown in prison he met his doom.

Having got rid of the chiefs about his Court, Ibrahim tried similarly to destroy the great feudal chieftains within his territories. The principal of these was Doulat Khan Lodi, the ruler of the Punjab. Being called to Court he sent his youngest son Dilawar Khan in his place. The latter was asked why his father had not come in person. He replied that he would come hereafter and bring treasure with him. He was told that if his father did not come he would be seized like the other nobles. The Sultan then ordered him to be taken to the dungeons, in order that he might see several nobles who were suspended from the walls. When Dilawar Khan witnessed this sight, he was seized with a fit of trembling, and was much alarmed. On his return to the presence, the Sultan said: "You have seen the condition of those who had disobeyed me." Dilawar Khan prostrated himself. It is said the Sultan intended to blind him with a red-hot bodkin, and suspend him also against the wall; but when Dilawar Khan perceived that there was no other means of escaping the Sultan's severity, he fled from Delhi, came to his father in six days, and told him that if he did not look to himself, the Sultan would put him to death in some cruel manner.

Thereupon, much as the English nobility did, when Richard the III was king, he determined to call in help from outside. He sent his son Dilawar Khan to invite Baber the Moghul (or Chagatai Turk as he should be really named) to invade India. Baber accepted the invitation, came to India, and after the decisive battle of Paniput, at which Ibrahim was killed, became the founder of the great dynasty of Emperors known to history as the Moghul Emperors of Delhi. How he did all this will be found in the next part of this work.

PART III.

BABER.

CHAPTER I.

AFTER Taimur's death his enormous Empire was more or less split up. Samarkand with the whole of Transoxiana came into the hands of his son Shahrukh Mirza, who reigned till A.D. 1446. He was succeeded by his son Ulugh Beg, who had already been four years governor of the city of Samarkand, and who was famed as an astronomer and patron of astronomers. This Prince's reign was short. His son rose in revolt against him and put him to death in A.D. 1449, a crime reprobated even in the East, where murders of one's relations have been ever too common. The rest of Taimur's dominion in Western Asia retained for a time by the other branches of the family; little by little only did the Osmanli Turks recover what they had lost, and the century had come to an end before Persia became finally separated from the house of Taimur and ruled by a national dynasty. Out of the states constituting Taimur's Empire, the kingdom of Khorasan, of which Herat was the chief town, became the most prosperous, alike on account of its agriculture, and on account of the culture and riches of its capital.

Baber, the first of the Moghul Rulers of India, was descended from Mirza Miranshah, third son of Taimur, whose only son Abusaid was defeated and killed in Ardebil, a place from which subsequently the Persian Royal Family sprang. He perished with the greater part of his army in one of the many battles fought between the various Turcoman hordes who had settled down in Persia. The greatness of the slaughter in this fight made a marked impression on Western Asia, and it was long remembered as the calamity of Irak. Mirza Umar, the father of Baber and the fourth son of Abusaid, obtained as his share of the paternal dominion the country of Ferganah or Andijan lying on both sides of the upper course of the river Jaxartes, chiefly on the southern side. It was in the capital of this kingdom that Baber was born. In order to understand his career, it is well to remember certain facts as regards the position of this kingdom of Ferganah. It stands in pretty much the same latitude as Central Italy, but instead of being near a temperate sea giving an equitable climate, it is in the very centre of an enormous continent. The Caspian and Aral seas, remains of a once mighty ocean, have but little influence on the climate of lands at any distance from them, and consequently in Ferganah there is great heat in summer, contrasted with extreme cold in winter. Ferganah itself is all the same capable of cultivation largely owing to the snowy ranges which more or less surround it, and from which perpetual rivers flow. Both corn and fruit grow for this reason abundantly. On the South and South-West lies Transoxiana, Maweranaher, a land long occupied by Turkish tribes, some of whom still at the time of which I am writing retained their nomadic manner of life, but the vast majority of whom, more or less, intermingled with Persian blood, had become settlers in towns and had more or less taken upon themselves the ways of Muhammedan civilization. On the North and North-East everywhere was steppe. Taimur in his great expeditions to the North had effectually overthrown the old Kipchak hordes dating from the time of Chinghiz Khan and his sons, but in their place had arose the fierce Uzbeks who proved themselves most terrible enemies alike to Baber and to the Persian Kings. In the East was the country of the great Khan, his people being mainly pastoral tribes, with tents for their homes, though here and there settled towns were to be found, and in these settled towns Muhammedan civilization of a sort. To the South and South-East arose the great mountain ranges ordinarily known as the Paropamisus or Hindu-kush only capable of supporting a meagre population, and in which, save in certain special spots, savagery ran supreme. Even to this day most of these ranges are inhabited by hill tribes hardly more than nominal Muhammedans, who retain very much their habits and ways of 400 years ago. Further South again are the kingdoms of Herat (Khorasan) and Kabul. The former, as I have just said, was at the time the centre of Muhammedan civilization, the latter an oasis amidst a host of semi-savage tribes. The inhabitants of all these countries save those of the towns in Transoxiana and the Southern kingdoms were necessarily enduring and hardy, for the feeble had but little chance of surviving. A climate such as that of Ferganah, though invigorating in the highest degree to the strong (recent travellers tell how many old men are to be found in the parts around Ferganah), is not fit for the residence of the feeble and weak. In no country in the world does nature's law as to the survival of the fittest work more inexorably.

Baber was 12 years of age when his father Umar Sheikh Mirza came to his end on the 9th of January 1494. The latter met his death in a strange fashion. In his palace stood a pigeon-house constructed on the edge of a precipitous cliff, overlooking the river below. While in this house, watching the pigeons, the cliff gave way and pigeon-house and Umar Sheikh Mirza were alike precipitated into the river below. He left behind him three sons, Baber and two younger brothers Jehangir Mirza and Nazir Mirza, both of whom were for many years thorns in their eldest brother's side.

Baber has left behind him an autobiography, one of the most illuminating books that the East has ever produced. There is no serious doubt of its being genuine. Internal evidence alone would go a very long way to prove this. As sincere and open as are the confessions of Rousseau, no one but the man who had gone through what the book relates, could have written these memoirs. No attempt is made by him to paint himself without the warts. He relates his follies and failures as much in detail and as remorselessly as he does his valiant deeds and successes. Occasionally he gasconades, but as a rule a severe impartiality is to be found in his pages. Much indeed, which we would call hateful, would seem anything but such to him. A king at twelve, he is from his youth upwards enured to blood and slaughter. We are told (not in his memoirs) that before he was long on his paternal throne he put to death one of his nobles who had conspired against him with his own hand. We read in his memoirs of pyramids of skulls, of a hundred prisoners being put to death at a time, without a word of condemnation from the writer, with indeed obvious approval. In this he was a man of his time and race, a descendant of Chenghiz Khan and Taimur; the sanctity of human life did not appeal to him. Compare him with others of the time and region, with Sheibani the Uzbek, with Shah Ismail or with Ibrahim Lodi, he seems mercy itself. Only once do we read of torture in his memoirs, and that was when an attempt was made by some kitchen servants at the instigation of Ibrahim Lodi's mother to poison him. And in this case beyond imprisoning her he did nothing to the lady herself. As to pederasty he writes with the insignificance of an ancient Greek. Pederasty was not, in the time of Baber, considered a vice at all. He tells us of his own feelings towards a trooper without the slightest abashment—so probably would have almost every other public man of his age in Western Asia; so indeed do we find it recorded of Bahram Khan fifty years later.

In Baber's remarks as to other rulers and nobles of the time, he frequently refers to them without apparent feeling either as catamites or the keepers of catamites, and his only censure is as to the excess and not as to the habit itself. Whatever inference may be drawn from the fact, it is there, and there is no blinking it.

Baber married a plurality of wives as other good Muhammedans of his time did, but seems not to have been at all a slave to conjugality nor indeed a great admirer of the sex. He tells us how with his first wife he was very shy, how his shyness increased and his affections diminished, until at last his mother like a fury used to fall upon him and scold him with great fury and send him off like a criminal to visit her once a month or forty days. He quotes Sadi's saying, "A bad wife in a good man's house even in this world makes a hell on earth," and adds, "May the Almighty remove such a visitation from every good Moslem and God grant that such a thing as an ill-tempered cross-grained wife be not left in the world."

As regards another ruler of the time, Abusaid Mirza of Samarkand, he says one of his wives drank wine. He was prodigiously attached to her. In her lifetime he dared not frequent any other of his ladies. At last he put her to death and delivered himself from his reproach. His affections, as regards women, indeed, seem to have been mainly concentrated on his blood relations, his mother, his grand-mother, his aunts and sisters. As to wine he was a most inveterate toper. He tells how for long he abstained, and how he first took to drinking with his relations, the sons of the King of Khorasan. When once he began he seems to have taken to the habit kindly enough. Like a true Oriental, a great part of his pleasure in drinking seems not to have been in the taste of the wine but in the result brought about. To be drunk was one of the greatest pleasures of his life. To be in a state of semi-intoxication with a number of his friends near a running stream or a wood with its leaves fanned by the wind was, according to him, one of the most pleasing ways of spending his idle time. In one curious passage he tells us how he was anxious to see a woman drink wine, a thing he says which he had never seen before. The woman was, however, too much for him, as he says she got riotous and he had to take himself away as best he could. I may say that not only drinking wine but drinking wine to excess seems to have been almost universal in the East during the fifteenth century in spite of all the injunction of Muhammad. Both Baber's brothers died from excess.

As to his mistakes in action no one is more severe than himself. For instance he tells us in one case when he fought the Uzbeks that the cause of his eagerness to engage was that the Pleiades were on that day exactly between the two armies and that if he had suffered that day to go by without fighting they would have been favourable to the enemy for a space of thirteen or fourteen days. These observations of his, he remarks, were all nonsense, and his precipitation was without the least solid excuse.

As to cowards, he, as a true Moghul, had supreme contempt. Talking of Sultan Ali Mirza, a distant relation of his who surrendered quietly to Shaibani, he says : * “ From his over-anxiety to preserve this transitory and mortal life, he left a name of infamy behind him, and, from following the suggestions of a woman, struck himself out of the list of those who have earned for themselves a glorious name. It is impossible to write any more of the transactions of such a personage, and impossible to listen any farther to the recital of such base and dastardly proceedings.” The woman here referred to was Sultan Ali Mirza’s mother, and the story told about her shows that human nature or at least female human nature is everywhere the same and at times leads one to very curious places. Sultan Ali Mirza’s mother who was by no means young, sent word to Shebani when he was besieging Samarkand, that if he would marry her, her son would surrender the town, he getting it back when Shaibani reconquered his own paternal dominions. Shaibani accepted the offer, got the town, married the woman indeed, but treated her with less consideration than he did any of his concubines and put, as I have stated above, the son to death.

As regards ingratitude Baber is also very severe. Talking of Khusrau, a nobleman of great wealth who seems to have been no worse than others of his time, though a great deal more able, but who acted treacherously towards his masters, he after praising his liberality and his business-like habits, says † “ Though he prayed regularly, and abstained from forbidden foods, yet he was blackhearted and vicious, of mean understanding, and slender talents, faithless and a traitor. For the sake of the short and fleeting pomp of this vain world, he put out the eyes of one and murdered another of the sons of the benefactor, in whose service he had been, and by whom he had been patronised and protected ; rendering himself accursed of God, abhorred of men, and worthy of execration and shame till the day of final retribution. These crimes he perpetrated merely to secure the enjoyment of some poor worldly vanities ; yet with all the power of his many and populous territories, in spite of his magazines of warlike stores, and the multitude of his servants. he had not the spirit to face a barn-door chicken."

---

* Baber’s Memoirs, p. 84.

† Baber’s Memoirs, p. 31.

Though fairly punctual in his prayers Baber's religion seems to have had anything but a powerful influence on him save indeed as regards submission to the will of God and a belief in the efficacy of repentance. In his later years he gave up wine, as he had made a vow to give it up after 40 ; but he drank specially copiously a year before he reached that age of forty. He was very fond of making satiric verses, but after a severe illness determined to give this up as unbecoming a Ruler or a Moslem. His boasting may well be considered justified, though according to modern ideas he blows his own trumpet rather too loudly. On one occasion he writes* as regards his taking of Samarkand : "For nearly a hundred and forty years, Samarkand had been the capital of my family. A foreign robber, one knew not whence he came, had seized the kingdom, which dropped from our hands. Almighty God now restored it to me, and gave me back my plundered and pillaged country. Sultan Hussain Mirza had also surprised Heri, much in the same way in which I had now taken Samarkand. But to persons of judgment and discrimination it is evident, and it is clear to every man of candour, that there was a very great difference between the two occurrences. The first distinction is, that Sultan Hussain Mirza was a mighty and powerful sovereign, of great experience, and in the maturity of his years and understanding. The second is, that his opponent, Yadgar Muhammed Mirza, was an inexperienced lad of seventeen or eighteen years of age. A third distinction is, that Mir Ali, the master of horse, who was perfectly acquainted with the whole conduct and proceedings of the enemy, was in his interest, and sent messengers to give him notice of them, and to bring him in an unguarded hour on his foe. A fourth difference is, that his opponent was not in a fortress, but at the Raven Garden, and when Sultan Hussain Mirza took the place, Yadgar Muhammed Mirza, with his attendants, had drunk so deeply of wine, that the only three persons on watch at Yadgar Muhammed Mirza's door were all drunk, as well as himself. The fifth distinction is, that he came and took it at the very first attempt, while the enemy were in the state of unsuspecting negligence that has been described. On the other hand, when I took Samarkand, I was only nineteen and had neither seen much action nor been improved by great experience. In the next place, I had opposed to me an enemy like Shaibani Khan, a man full of talents, of deep experience, and in the meridian of life. In the third place, no persons came from Samarkand to give me any information; for though the townspeople were well inclined to me, yet, from dread of Shaibani Khan, none of them dared to think of such a step. In the fourth place, my enemies were in a fortified place, and I had both to take the place and to rout the enemy. Fifthly, I had once before come for the purpose of surprising Samarkand, and thereby put the enemy on their guard; yet, on a second attempt, by the favour of God, I succeeded and gained the city. In these observations, I have no wish to detract from any man's merits, the facts were exactly as has been mentioned. Nor, in what I have said, is it my wish to exalt the merits of my own enterprise beyond the truth; I have merely detailed the circumstances precisely as they stood."

* Baber's Memoirs, pp. 88-89.

Again after the battle of Paniput he says * "From the time of the blessed Prophet (on whom and on his family be peace and salvation) down to the present time, three foreign kings had subdued the country, and acquired the sovereignty of Hindustan. One of these was Sultan Mahmud Ghazi, whose family long continued to fill the throne of that country. The second was Sultan Shahabuddin Ghuri, and for many years his slaves and dependants swayed the sceptre of these realms. I am the third. But my achievement is not to be put on the same level with theirs, for Sultan Mahmud, at the time when he conquered Hindustan, occupied the throne of Khorasan, and had absolute power and dominion over the Sultans of Khwarizm and the surrounding chiefs. The King of Samarkand too was subject to him. If his army did not amount to two hundred thousand, yet grant that it was only one hundred thousand, and it is plain that the comparison between the two conquests must cease. Moreover, his enemies were Rajas. All Hindustan was not at that period subject to a single Emperor : every Raja set up for a Monarch on his own account, in his own petty territories. Again, though Sultan Shahabuddin Ghuri did not himself enjoy the sovereignty of Khorasan, yet his elder brother, Sultan Ghiasuddin Ghuri, held it. In the Tabakat-Nasiri it is said, that on one occasion he marched into Hindustan with one hundred and twenty thousand cataphract horses. His enemies, too, were Rais and Rajas ; a single Monarch did not govern the whole of Hindustan. When I marched into Behreh we might amount to one thousand five hundred, or two thousand men at the utmost. When I invaded the country for the fifth time, overthrew Sultan Ibrahim, and subdued the empire of Hindustan, I had a larger army than I had ever brought into it. My servants, the merchants and their servants, and the followers of all descriptions that were in the camp along with me, were numbered, and amounted to twelve thousand men. The kingdoms that depended upon me were Badakhshan, Kundez, Kabul and Kandahar ; but these countries did not furnish me with assistance equal to their resources ; and indeed, some of them, from their vicinity to the enemy, were so circumstanced, that, far from affording me assistance, I was obliged to send them extensive supplies from my other territories. Besides, this, all Maweranaher was occupied by the Khans and Sultan of the Uzbegs. whose armies were calculated to amount to about a hundred thousand men, and who were my ancient foes. Finally, the whole Empire of Hindustan, from Behreh to Behar, was in the hands of the Afghans. Their prince, Sultan Ibrahim, from the resources of his kingdom, could bring into the field an army of five hundred thousand men. At that time some of the Amirs to the East were in a state of rebellion. His army on foot was computed to be a hundred thousand strong ; his own elephants, with those of his Amirs, were reckoned at nearly a thousand. Yet, under such circumstances, and in spite of this power, placing my trust in God, and leaving behind me my old and inveterate enemy, the Uzbegs, who had an army of a hundred thousand men, I advanced to meet so powerful a prince as Sultan Ibrahim, the lord of numerous armies, and emperor of extensive territories. In consideration of my confidence in Divine aid, the Most High God, did not suffer the distress and hardships that I had undergone to be thrown away, but defeated my formidable enemy, and made me the conqueror of the noble country of Hindustan. This success I do not ascribe to my own strength, nor did this good fortune flow from my own efforts, but from the fountain of the favour and mercy of God."

---

* Baber's Memoirs, pp. 309,310.

---

CHAPTER II.

THE death of Baber's father brought about a result ordinary enough in an Eastern State when the successor to the throne is a minor. His paternal and maternal uncles both attempted to seize parts of his inheritance; the former, Sultan Ali Mirza, the Ruler at the time of Samarkand, invaded Ferganah from the South-West, while the latter, Muhammad Khan, invaded it from the East. Neither, however, effected very much, nor yet did Amir Ababeker Mirza Dohiglat, the Ruler of Kashgar, who also attempted to take advantage of the minority of Baber. The description of Sultan Ali Mirza given by Baber shows him to have been a typical Turk. It is too graphic not to be reproduced* here:

"He had never read any (so in the translation), and, though brought up in the city, was illiterate and unrefined. He was a plain honest Turk, but not favoured by genius. He was, however, a just man; and as he always consulted the reverend Khwajeh in affairs of importance, he generally acted in conformity to the law. He was true to his promises, and faithful to his compacts or treaties, from which he never swerved. He was brave; and though he never happened to be engaged hand-to-hand in close combat, yet they say that in several actions he showed proofs of courage. He excelled in archery. He was a good marksman. With his arrows and forked arrows he generally hit the mark ; and in riding from one side of the exercise ground to the other, he used to hit the brazen basin several times. Latterly, when he became very corpulent, he took to bringing down pheasants and quails, with the goshawks, and seldom failed. He was fond of hawking, and was particularly skilled in flying the hawk, an amusement which he frequently practised. If you except Ulugh Beg Mirza, there was no other king who equalled him in field-sports. He was singularly observant of decorum, insomuch that it is said, that even in private, before his own people, and nearest relations, he never uncovered his feet. Whenever he took to drinking wine, he would drink without intermission for twenty or thirty days. In social parties he would sometimes sit day and night, and drink profusely ; on the days when he did not drink, he ate pungent substances. He was naturally of a penurious disposition, was a simple man, of few words, and entirely guided by his Begs."

---

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 21.

The Sultan's death brought about a dispute as to the succession at Samarkand. Baber took advantage of this to conquer Samarkand for himself. This he did in the year 1497 A.D. He did not, however, long keep his conquest. While engaged in wars abroad, troubles had broken out at home in which the leader was one Sultan Ahmad Tambol, a Mongol. The success of the rebels was considerably helped by a dangerous illness which Baber had while in Samarkand. He tells us that people despaired of his life for a very considerable time, that on his recovery he received several messages from home and that he was forced to abandon Samarkand in order to save the chief forts of his own country which were being besieged by his domestic enemies. He was, however, too late, and his chief supporter Khwajah Kazi was hanged by the rebels over the gate of the citadel of Andijan. This Kazi's murderers came to a bad end. Baber writes in his Memoirs thus :*

"I have no doubt that Khwajah Kazi was a Wali (or saint). What better proof of it could be required than the single fact that, in a short time, no trace or memorial remained of any one of all those who were concerned in his murder. They were all completely extirpated. Khwajah Kazi was a wonderfully bold man, which is also no mean proof of sanctity. All mankind, however, brave they be, have some little anxiety or trepidation about them. The Khwajah had not a particle of either."

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 58.

Baber's condition was now that of a landless adventurer, but with the buoyancy of youth, after a short lapse into absolute misery, he laughed at misfortunes, and determined to attempt his fortunes again on the field of battle. His thoughts returned to Samarkand which the mighty Shaibani had seized in A. D. 1500.

The latter's Uzbegs, wild sons of the desert, had made themselves thoroughly disliked by the people of Samarkand, and consequently when Baber with a small force took possession of that place by stratagem the citizens joined with him and pursued the Uzbegs in every street and corner with sticks and stones and hunted them down like mad dogs. Shaibani who was in the town at the time made his way to Bokhara. Shortly after this it was that Baber fought the battle with Shaibani in which he relied on the Pleiades as I have stated above, in which he was totally defeated. His defeat, he says, was turned into a rout by the bad behaviour of his Moghul troops. These wretches, he says, if they defeat an enemy instantly seize upon the booty: and if they are defeated, plunder and dismount their own allies, and betide what may, carry off the spoil. He quotes a couplet as to them which I reproduce :*

If the Moghul race were a race of angels, it is a bad race ;
 And were the name Moghul written in gold, it would be odious ;
 Take care not to pluck one ear of corn from a Moghul harvest ;
 The Moghul seed is such that whatever is sowed with it is execrable.

The consequence was that he was besieged in Samarkand, and after a long blockade had to surrender on terms. What these were he does not clearly mention, but it seems that one of the terms at least was the marriage of his sister with the hated Shaibani. It was after this that he met for the first time his maternal uncle, the younger Khan. At the time Baber was a resident at the camp of his elder paternal uncle Sultan Mahmud Khan. Baber describes very graphically how he met his younger uncle.*

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 93.

“Between Tashkend and Seiram there is a village named Yeghma, as well as some other small villages, where are the tombs of Ibrahim Ata and Ishak Ata. We advanced as far as these villages, and not knowing precisely the time that the younger Khan would arrive, I had ridden out carelessly to see the country, when all at once I found myself face to face with him. I immediately alighted and advanced to meet him; at the moment I dismounted, the Khan knew me and was greatly disturbed; for he had intended to alight somewhere and having seated himself to receive and embrace me with great form and decorum: but I came too quick upon him and dismounted so rapidly that there was no time for ceremony; at the moment I sprang from my horse, I knelt down and then embraced. He was a good deal agitated and disconcerted. At length he ordered Sultan Said Khan and Baber Khan Sultan to alight, kneel, and embrace me.”

The meeting between the two brothers is also graphically described: †

“My uncle, the elder Khan, came three or four farsangs out from Tashkend, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced straight up, and on coming near him in front, turned to the left of the elder Khan, fetching a circle round him, till he again presented himself in front, when he alighted; and when he came to the distance at which the Kornish is performed, he knelt nine times, and then came up and embraced him.

The elder Khan, immediately on the younger Khan's coming near, stood up and embraced him; they stood a long time clasping each other in their arms. The younger Khan, while retiring, again knelt nine times, and then he presented his peshkesh (or tributary offering); he again knelt many times; after which he went and sat down.”

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 105.

† Baber's Memoirs, p. 106.

The next years of Baber's life were spent in attempts to recover his paternal inheritance, the Kingdom of Ferganah. His two maternal uncles, his brother Jehangir, Sultan Ahmad Tambol, now as friends, now as foes flit across the stage, with purposes sometimes cross to Baber's, always cross to one another's. Finally Sultan Ahmad Tambol calls in Shaibani. Baber is defeated and forced to flee and his Memoirs are interrupted for more than a year. The last he tells of himself is that he, being alone, is trapped into a hostile town. When these Memoirs begin again, Shaibani has conquered Ferganah and he (Baber) leaves that country for good. Looking about him as to where he may have a chance of reigning, away from the terrible Shaibani, his thoughts turn towards Kabul. There a Taimurid dynasty had reigned since the death of the great Taimur until very recently when Abdur Rizak, a cousin of Baber's, had been expelled by Muhammad Mokim Arghun, a son of Zulum Arghun, a soldier of fortune, who nominally a servant of the King of Herat, had established himself as a practically independent Prince at Kandahar. The high mountain ranges which separate the country now known as Afghanistan from Ferganah were then ruled over by Khusrau. The chief support of his rule was the Moghul soldiery, who as soldiers of fortune had enlisted under him, but when Baber passed through this country, this soldiery, whether induced by promises from Baber or not, it is impossible to say, deserted Khusrau and joined themselves to Baber. Khusrau had consequently to give up his sovereignty to Baber and to retire, content with a promise of a safe conduct for himself and his personal property to Khorasan. Some of Baber's followers wished to kill him, but Baber, more scrupulous than the great Taimur, not only refused to have anything to do with such a breach of his word, but prevented his followers from attempting anything of the sort. Some little time after Khusrau returned from Khorasan and attempted to take Kundez which had fallen into Shaibani's hands, was taken prisoner and beheaded A.D. 1505.

On the way to Kabul, Baber mentions that he saw for the first time Canopus. The fact of his mentioning this shows how much more heed the wanderers of Central Asia take of the starry heavens than the residents of Europe. We read in sailors' travels indeed, how they first notice the Southern Cross, and to the wanderers of Asia a steppe or desert is much what the ocean is to a navigator. Baber's conquest of Kabul was bloodless. Mokim retired to Shah Zelnun, his father, at Kandahar. Baber, save for occasional local disturbances, remained for the rest of his life the actual Ruler of the Kabul Kingdom. He is never tired of singing this country's praises; concerning it he writes:

"This country lies between Hindustan and Khorasan.* It is an excellent and profitable market for commodities. Were the merchants to carry their goods as far as Khita or Rum, they would scarcely get the same profit on them. Every year, seven, eight, or ten thousand horses arrive in Kabul. From Hindustan every year, fifteen or twenty thousand pieces of cloth are bought by caravans. The commodities of Hindustan are slaves, white clothes, sugar-candy, refined and common sugar, drugs and spices. There are many merchants that are not satisfied with getting thirty or forty for ten. The productions of Khorasan, Rum, Irak and Chin, may all be found in Kabul, which is the very emporium of Hindustan. Its warm and cold districts are close by each other. From Kabul you may in a single day go to a place where snow never falls, and in the space of two astronomical hours, you may reach a spot where snow lies always, except now and then when the summer happens to be peculiarly hot. In the districts dependent on Kabul, there is great abundance of the fruits both of hot and cold climates, and they are found in its immediate vicinity. The fruits of the cold districts in Kabul are grapes, pomegranates, apricots, peaches, pears, apples, quinces, jujubes, damsons, almonds and walnuts, all of which are found in great abundance. I caused the sour-cherry tree to be brought here and planted; it produced excellent fruit, and continues thriving. The fruits it possesses, peculiar to a warm climate, are the orange, citron, the amluk, and sugar-cane, which are brought from the Lamghanat. I caused the sugar-cane to be brought, and planted it here. They have numbers of beehives, but honey is brought only from the hill country on the West. The raw-ash (rhubarb) of Kabul is of excellent quality; its quinces and damask plums are excellent, as well as its badrengs.* There is a species of grape which they call the water-grape, that is very delicious; its wines are strong and intoxicating. That produced on the skirt of the mountain of Khwajah Khan Said is celebrated for its potency, though I describe it only from what I have heard.

---

* Baber's Memoirs, pp. 137, 138.

“The drinker knows the flavour of the wine; how should the sober know it? Kabul is not fertile in grain; a return of four or five to one is reckoned favourable. The melons too are not good, but those raised from seed brought from Khorasan are tolerable. The climate is extremely delightful, and in this respect there is no such place in the known world. In the nights of summer you cannot sleep without a postin (or lambskin-cloak). Though the snow falls very deep in the winter, yet the cold is never excessively intense. Samarkand and Tabriz are celebrated for their fine climate, but the cold there is extreme beyond measure.”

It must be remembered that the name of Afghanistan as the country of the Afghans is new. A large part of the country now known by the name, is even to this day inhabited by tribes quite distinct from the Afghans, and it has only been within the last few centuries that the Afghans have become the dominant tribes in the country between Kabul and the lands between Kabul and India. When Baber writes about them he always speaks in words of dispraise. He will hardly believe that they are Muhammedans at all, but prefers talking about them as Kafirs and, from what we can learn, they seem to have had many heathen customs. The Memoirs relate one or two curious superstitions of this race. One was that they believed that if a woman was virtuous in her lifetime she would at her death, when placed on a bier, move; so we read that the Sultan of Bajour when his mother died neither made lamentations, nor expressed sorrow, nor arrayed himself in black, but only said—“Go and place her on the bier; if she does not move I will burn her." They placed her on a bier and the corpse had the desired motion. On hearing this he put on black and gave vent to his sorrow.

---

* Note.—A large green fruit in shape somewhat like a citron.

Another curious fable he mentions as regards a bird which he called the Lokheh or Chameleon-bird, to wit, that if it flies across a vineyard, it falls down.

Shortly after his arrival at Kabul, his mother fell ill with a disease known as kusbi, which Erksine translates as measles. The cure prescribed was a dish of water-melons: the result was death. He buried her in the garden of Ulugh Beg Mirza at Kabul. He is careful to mention that before doing so, he got permission from the Mirza's heirs. The Muhammedans are particularly careful not to bury their dead in land got by wrong or oppression, and Baber in his care to get the rightful owner's permission, acted as a typical Muhammedan. He mentions that shortly after his mother's death there was a great earthquake* in Kabul, and that actual rifts were made in the ground. The results do not seem to have been very serious.

His first expedition from Kabul was towards the East. Sweeping down the Kabul River he skirts the Eastern passes of the Sulaman Range and then through the Southern passes, back to Kabul. Shaibani having now recruited in the North, and having become the undoubted Ruler of Mawaranaher, a great part of Ferganah and of the Western part of the Hindukush country, now began to interfere with the Kingdom of Khorasan. Just at this time Sultan Hussein Mirza, the Ruler of that country, whose capital was Herat, died.

The fame of this king, who was a cultured and accomplished Monarch, was great. Herat under him became the greatest seat of Muhammedan civilisation in Western Asia. At the same time there was a reverse side to the picture. He had most of his sons constantly rebelling, and he had no compunction in punishing them even unto death. He was a great wine bibber, and as Baber tells us, his sons the whole of the soldiery and the towns people, followed his example in this respect and seemed to vie with each other in debauchery and lasciviousness. On his death his sons showed themselves absolutely incapable of defending the kingdom against Shaibani. Zalnun Arghun, the Ruler of Kandahar, one of the most enterprising and bravest men of the time, was the first to attack this conqueror. With all his virtues, this noble was both credulous and ignorant.

---

* This earthquake was probably the same that was felt in Agra, concerning which I have written above.

Several Mullahs having told him that they had intercourse with the spheres and that the title of Hezeber-ulla (the lion of God) had been conferred on him, and also having predicted to him that he was predestined to defeat the Uzbegs, he implicitly believing their prophecies and divine revelations, fiercely attacked Shaibani with a small body of men. Then, as now, Providence showed itself on the side of the heavy battalions, and so he was taken prisoner and put to death. Baber was invited by his two cousins, the sons of Sultan Hussein Mirza who had become the chief kings of Herat, to help them in the war. He accordingly proceeded to Herat, but having found that there was no unity in council nor any serious preparations for successful resistance against the Uzbegs returned, and after a thousand difficulties in making his way through the hill country between Herat and Kabul where the Hazaras dwelled (not to be confounded with the country now known as Hazaristan) returned to the latter place only to find that a rebellion in which his grandmother had taken a great part, had placed one of his many cousins on the throne. All that he got from going to Herat was learning to drink. The rebellion was easily put down. One of the chief promoters of it was Muhammad Hasan Mirza, father of the author of the Tariki-Rishidi. Baber mentions him as one of the many whom he had loaded with benefits, and whose only return to him had been ingratitude. "Leave them, however, to the hands of fate, for fate is the servant who will avenge," and so it happened that Muhammad Hasan Mirza shortly afterwards met his death at Shaibani's hands. The latter took Herat, became the master of Kandahar, and had the whole of Khorasan at his feet. He was now, however, to meet as able and unscrupulous a Ruler as himself. Shah Ismail, the founder of the first national dynasty that had ruled over Persia, since the days when Khalid, the lion of God, had destroyed the old Persian Empire on the field of Nehavend some nine centuries previously, was a Sayid whose father and more remote ancestors had been noted for their personal sanctity as well as esteemed for being the descendants of the Prophet. His birthplace was Ardebil in the hilly country south of the Caspian Sea. Little by little partly by his great wealth, for a recognised saint in those days by means of offerings amassed great riches, and partly by his ability both in council and action, he had become the Ruler of all Persia. More than once he successfully withstood the might of the Ottoman Empire, and during his long reign the latter made no serious encroachments on the various lands which had been in the possession of the descendants of Taimur.

Shaibani, whose one idea of statesmanship was that of Rob Roy's, that he should take who had the might and he should keep who can, had in his predatory expeditions entered the country over which Shah Ismail ruled. The latter sent an embassy to Shaibani asking him to forbear. The Uzbek Ruler who was a strict Sunni answered the Shiah Shah Ismail with scorn: "I," he said, "am a Prince who hold my dominions by hereditary descent. I do not understand what claim you Shah Ismail have to the countries you call your hereditary dominions. Sovereignty descends through the father and not the mother." This he said inasmuch as Shah Ismail had claimed to rule over a large part of Persia on the ground that he was descended by his mother from Uzar Hasan who, as the chief of the Turkoman Horde, had once been Ruler of the country. A son, he added, should follow his father's trade, a daughter her mother's, so I send you a lady's veil and beggar's dish. (This he said referring to Ismail's father having been a Fakir.)

If thou hast forgotten thy father's trade the dish may serve it to recall it to thy memory; but if thou wouldst place thy foot on the steps of the throne remember: "He that would clasp to his breast royalty as his bride, must woo her in the battle-fray athwart sharp scimitars."

As a good Musalman, I shortly propose to make a pilgrimage to Mecca and on my way I shall pass through Irak. Shah Ismail's reply is thus related by Erskine : * " The youthful warrior who professed to feel a pride in his descent from a family of holy dervishes, that gloried in their voluntary poverty, received the Uzbek's taunts with affected humility. He returned for answer, that if every man was bound to follow his father's trade, all being sons of Adam, must adhere to that of prophets ; that if hereditary descent conferred the only right to sovereignty, he did not see how it had descended from the Peshdadi to the Kyani dynasties of Persia, or how it had come to Chenghiz, or to him whom he addressed.

" Boast not thyself, O vain youth, of thy father, who is dead ; Pride not thyself on bones, as if thou wert a dog."

That he, on his part, proposed making a pilgrimage to the shrine of the holy Imam Reza at Meshed, where he would have an opportunity of waiting on the Khan. In return for his present, he sent him a spindle and distaff ; and, alluding to his quotation, that royalty must be wooed in the battle-field, he concluded : " And so say I also. Lo, I have tightened my girdle for a deadly contest, and have placed the foot of determination in the stirrup of victory. If thou wilt meet me face to face in fight like a man, our quarrel will at once be decided. But if thou wouldst rather slink into a corner, then thou mayst find what I have sent thee of some use."

" We have sparred quite long enough, let us now exchange hard blows in the field.

" He who falls, borne down in the combat, let him fall."

After this diplomatic correspondence, Shah Ismail pushed forward with great speed and found Shaibani with a small body of troops near Merv into which town the latter threw himself. Shah Ismail when he was near Merv wrote to Shaibani stating that he had been more punctual in keeping his engagements than Shaibani had been, having performed the pilgrimage to Meshed, whereas Shaibani had not yet gone to Mecca. Having despatched this letter, he pretended to retreat and thereby allured Shaibani out of the citadel of Merv. When the Uzbegs had got so far from the town that retreat was impossible, they suddenly fell on the whole Persian Army which had been drawn up to meet them, and in the battle which ensued were totally defeated. Shaibani being driven into a small walled enclosure was there overlaid by his troops endeavouring to escape thereout and smothered. In A.D. 1510 his head was cut off and his skin stuffed with hay. The former was sent as a present to the Sultan at Constantinople.

* Erskine, Vol. I, pp. 299-300.

A story is told about Agha Rustum Raz Afzun of Persia, who in these troublesome times had made himself master of Mazenderan, holding out there against Shah Ismail, and who was in the habit of saying that his hands were on the skirts of Shaibani's garment, meaning thereby that Shaibani would always give him protection. After Shaibani's death a special messenger sent by Shah Ismail came on a festival day into the Agha's court, and after reminding the Agha that his hands had never been on the hem of Shaibani's garment added that Shaibani's hand would now be on the hem of his garment. Thereupon he threw the severed hand of Shaibani into that of the Ruler's lap. He escaped without injury.

The battle of Merv and the death of Shaibani completely changed the state of affairs in Western Asia. Shah Ismail now became by far the most powerful Ruler there, but from him Baber had comparatively little to dread. It is more than hinted, however, by the historians who write of Baber's early days that he was forced to become more or less a vassal of Shah Ismail. Certain it is that he entered into a joint invasion of Maweranaher along with the Persian, that he conquered in the said invasion Samarkand in A.D. 1511, but that after a short time the people who had formerly been favourable to him became deadly hostile, and that consequently he had finally to flee after being defeated in more battles than one, from Maweranaher, which country he never again penetrated. In the year 1514 he left Transoxiana never to return, retaining no possessions North of the Hindukush Range. The only explanation afforded as to why he became so disliked by the people of Samarkand is that his conjunction with the heretical Shiah, who were the most bigoted of mortals, alienated the Sunnis who constituted the whole community of the Muhammedans North of Oxus.

Shortly before the death of Shaibani, Baber had taken Kandahar from the Arghuns and had found therein an enormous booty. He, however, retained possession of this place, but for a short time, inasmuch as Shaibani marched through Herat and reconquered it without any difficulty. It was at this time that Baber took to himself the name of Padshah (commonly translated as Emperor).

After his final expulsion from the countries between the Oxus and Jaxartes his thoughts turned to India. I have already spoken of his first expedition down the river Kabul, but it was not till the year 1519 that he began to take serious steps towards conquering any part of Hindustan. In 1519 he only got as far as the Fort of Bajour which is well to the West of the Indus. The people in the Fort he describes as rebels to the followers of Islam and also followers of the customs and usages of infidels. On taking the Fort he put them all to the sword. During this expedition he mentions that he came to the tomb of Shahbaz Kalendar, whom he describes as an impious unbeliever. It stood, as he tells us, in a charming and delightful spot. Deeming such a place too good for the tomb of an infidel, he ordered it to be demolished. Fortunately for our opinion of Baber, we do not often hear of his committing acts of this sort. He mentions also in his expedition near the Indus the hunting of rhinoceroses, which he says were plentiful there. Not one is, I believe, now to be found in those parts.

After conquering Bajour he marched into the North-West Punjab. This he says had long been in the possession of the Turks and so he regarded it as his own domain. Acting on this principle he prevents his soldiers from plundering, punished with death some whom he found disobeying his orders. He then sends an embassy to Sultan Ibrahim, Ruler at Delhi, to demand that the countries which in the olden times had belonged to the Turks should be given up to him. He also sent messages to Doulat Khan Lodi, the powerful Subhadar at Lahore. The ambassador to the Sultan had to pass the territory of Lahore and therefore to present himself to Doulat Khan Lodi before proceeding.* As to the result of this Mission, he writes—"The people of Hindustan, and particularly the Afghans, are a strangely foolish and senseless race, possessed of little reflection and less foresight. They can neither persist in and manfully support a war, nor can they continue in a state of amity and friendship. This person who was sent by me, Doulat Khan detained some time in Lahore, neither seeing him himself, nor suffering him to proceed to Sultan Ibrahim; so that my envoy, five months after, returned to Kabul without having received any answer."

After certain contests with the Gakkars, he returned to Kabul without having made any substantial conquests to the East of the Indus. His next invasion of India was in the year 1523. Before this Doulat Khan Lodi having distrusted Sultan Ibrahim, who was cutting off the heads of the tall poppies very freely, had sent him an invitation to come and deliver Hindustan from the cruelties of the reigning sovereign. A pretender to the throne of Delhi in the person of a brother of the Sultan had also come to his court. In this invasion, Baber burnt the bazar and town of Lahore, and advancing to Dibalpur he took that place by storm. There he was met by Doulat Khan Lodi who did not, however, get on well with him, he having very different ideas from Baber as to what their respective positions should be after the defeat of Sultan Ibrahim. The consequence was that Baber, who had advanced as far as Sirhind, was forced to return. The next step in the invasion of India was in the year 1525 A. D., when the pretender, aided by Doulat Khan Lodi, marched towards Delhi. There he was defeated by Ibrahim Sultan. Baber relates how the pretender's hope of success was largely based on the Afghan's nobles abandoning Ibrahim and joining him, and how a night attack was determined upon, inasmuch as the Afghans object to deserting in the daytime, but have no scruples about deserting at night, and how by mischance the battle between the parties was in the daytime and not in the night. After the defeat of the pretender, Baber himself invaded India with a force more carefully prepared than any which he had led there before. Sultan Ibrahim marched through Delhi to meet him. After a skirmish in which Baber's eldest son Humayan distinguished himself, the two forces met at Paniput, a small town 40 miles from Delhi. Here more than once the fate of India has been decided, the last time being when the Afghans under Ahmed Shah Abdah shattered to fragments the Mahratta confederation in 1761 A.D. Baber describes the battle, but beyond the fact that his troops were much better in hand than those of his opponents and that the victory was won by his flanks extending and then pressing in the flanks of the opposing force, there is not much of detail worthy of record to be found in the Memoirs. Sufficient to say that the forces of Ibrahim Sultan which far exceeded Baber's army in numbers were utterly defeated, and that Ibrahim was himself killed. Three marches brought Baber to Delhi and some forced further marches to Agra, where Baber entered as a conqueror and Emperor on the 10th of May 1526. With his conquest of these two towns, the old Afghan dynasties came to an end, and the reign of the Great Moghuls began. It is expedient here therefore to stop, and before proceeding further to take a bird's-eye view of Hindustan as it was when the Ferganah petty prince became Lord of the great Empire of India.

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 257.

---

CHAPTER III.

INDIA, outside the great towns, when Baber conquered Delhi, had no roads. The Afghan Rulers, great builders of palaces and tombs, though they did much in their palmier days to promote irrigation, never attempted to become road-builders. This is not surprising seeing that the idea of a road as a method of Empire first really originated at Rome, and it is only in the case of kingdoms which have sprung from the Roman Empire and which have Roman traditions, that road-building has ever taken a prominent place. One of the reasons for the absolute want of permanency in the earlier great Empires of Asia was the want of inland communication, and so in India, although the Afghans from the time of Mahmud Ghazni in the eleventh century up to the days of Baber, had everywhere established kingdoms and settled themselves as conquerors, still their influence on the countries they conquered was comparatively small. The Afghan conquerors ruled in the great towns and wherever there were settlements of their own countrymen or of Hindu converts to Islam; elsewhere they were more or less simply collectors of revenue, and their rulers, though they were nominally kings over a large part of India, had really but little influence (save as tax collectors) over the Hindu population. It was in the days of the Afghan Rulers that Benares, the centre of Hinduism, reached its highest fame, and that the systems of Hindu law and of metaphysics definitely assumed the position they now hold.

Students of Sanskrit Literature tell us that little will be found therein showing any influence of Muhammedan thought thereon. An exception may be made as regards astronomy, but even as regards this according to the best authority its influence is but slight.

As the country had no roads neither had it any bridges when an army had to cross a river it either had to ford it or to procure boats. Travelling accordingly during the rainy season became, if not impossible, exceedingly difficult, and at all times of the year was an arduous undertaking. Accordingly parts of India close to each other in position were politically less united than now are, say the Madras Presidency and the Punjab.

Baber's* impressions of India and of the people were by no means favourable. He says—"Hindustan is a country that has few pleasures to recommend it. The people are not handsome. They have no idea of the charms of friendly society, of frankly mixing together, or of familiar intercourse. They have no genius, no comprehension of mind, no politeness of manner, no kindness or fellow-feeling, no ingenuity or mechanical invention in planning or executing their handicraft works, no skill or knowledge in design or architecture ; they have no good horses, no good flesh, no grapes or musk-melons, no good fruits, no ice or cold water, no good food or bread in their bazars, no baths or colleges, no candles, no torches, not a candlestick. Instead of a candle and torch, you have a gang of dirty fellows, whom they call Deutis, who hold in their left hand a kind of small tripod, to the side of one leg of which, it being wooden, they stick a piece of iron like the top of a candlestick ; they fasten a pliant wick, of the size of the middle finger, by an iron pin, to another of the legs. In their right hand they hold a gourd, in which they have made a hole for the purpose of pouring out oil in a small stream, and whenever the wick requires oil, they supply it from this gourd. Their great men kept a hundred or two hundred of these Deutis. This is the way in which they supply the want of candles and candlesticks. If their Emperors or chief nobility at any time have occasion for a light by night, these filthy Deutis bring in their lamp, which they carry up to their master, and there stand holding it close by his side.

---

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 333.

Besides their rivers and standing waters, they have some running water in their ravines and hollows ; they have no aqueducts or canals in their gardens or palaces. In their buildings they study neither elegance nor climate, appearance nor regularity. Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langoti, which is a piece of clout that hangs down like two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this pendant modesty-clout is another slip of clout, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langoti, and then passing the slip of clout between the two legs bring it up and fix it to the string of the langoti behind. The women, too, have a langoti, one end of it they tie about their waist, and the other they throw over their heads."

As to the advantages of the country he tells us*—"The chief excellency of Hindustan is, that it is a large country, and has abundance of gold and silver. The climate during the rains is very pleasant. On some days it rains ten, fifteen, and even twenty times. During the rainy season inundations come pouring down all at once, and form rivers, even in places where, at other times, there is no water. While the rains continue on the ground, the air is singularly delightful, in so much that nothing can surpass its soft and agreeable temperature. Its defect is that the air is rather moist and damp. During the rainy season you cannot shoot even with the bow of our country, and it becomes quite useless. Nor is it the bow alone that becomes useless; coats of mail, books, clothes, and furniture, all feel the bad effects of the moisture. Their houses, too, suffer from not being substantially built. There is pleasant enough weather in the winter and summer, as well as the rainy season; but then the North wind always blows, and there is an excessive quantity of air and dust flying about. When the rains are at hand, this wind blows five or six times with excessive violence, and such a quantity of dust flies about that you cannot see one another. They call this andhi; it gets warm during Taurus and Gemini, but not so warm as to become intolerable. The heat cannot be compared to the heats of Balkh or Kandahar. It is not above half so warm as in these places. Another convenience of Hindustan is, that the workmen of every profession and trade are innumerable and without end. For any work or any employment there is always a set ready, to whom the same employment and trade have descended from father to son from ages. In the Zefer-Namah of Mulla Sherif-ed-din Ali Yezdi, it is mentioned as a surprising fact, that when Taimur Beg was building the Sangin (or stone) mosque, there were stone-cutters of Azerbaijan, Fars, Hindustan, and other countries, to the number of two hundred, working every day on the mosque. In Agra alone, and of stone-cutters belong to that place only, I every day employed on my palaces six hundred and eighty persons; and in Agra, Sikri, Biana, Dhulpur, Gwalior and Koel, there were every day employed on my works one thousand four hundred and ninety one stone-cutters. In the same way, men of every trade and occupation are numberless and without stint in Hindustan."

---

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 333.

As to personal troubles he tells us *—“We were annoyed with three things in Hindustan; one was its heat, another its strong winds, the third its dust. Baths were the means of removing all three inconveniences. In the bath we could not be affected by the wind. During the hot winds the cold can be rendered so intense, that a person often feels as if quite powerless from it. The room of the bath, in which is the tub or cistern, is finished wholly of stone. The water-run is of white stone; all the rest of it, its floor and roof, is of a red stone, which is the stone of Biana.”

A daily bath is a necessity in India, alike for a foreigner and native, but in modern India save amongst the wealthier Muhammedans a Turkish bath as described by Baber is now unknown.

CHAPTER IV.

In another place Baber writes about Hindustan as follows.—

† “The country and towns of Hindustan are extremely ugly. All its towns and lands have an uniform look; its gardens have no walls; the greater part of it is a level plain. The banks of its rivers and streams, in consequence of the rushing of the torrents that descend during the rainy season, are worn deep into the channel, which makes it generally difficult and troublesome to cross them. In many places the plain is covered by a thorny brushwood, to such a degree that the people of the Perganah relying on these forests, take shelter in them, and, trusting to their inaccessible situation, often continue in a state of revolt, refusing to pay their taxes. In Hindustan, if you except the rivers, there is little running water. Now and then some standing water is to be met with. All these cities and countries derive their water from wells or tanks in which it is collected during the rainy season. In Hindustan, the populousness and decay, or total destruction of villages, nay of cities, is almost instantaneous. Large cities that have been inhabited for a series of years (if, on an alarm, the inhabitants take to flight), in a single day or a day and a half, are so completely abandoned, that you can scarcely discover a trace or mark of population. And if, on the other hand, they intend to settle on any particular spot, as they do not need to run water-courses or to build flood-mounds, their crops being produced without irrigation, and the population of Hindustan being unlimited, inhabitants swarm in every direction. They make a tank or dig a well; there is no need of building a strong house or erecting a firm wall; they have abundance of strong grass and plenty of timber, of which they run up hovels, and a village or town is constructed in an instant."

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 341.

† Baber's Memoirs, p. 315.

He also mentions the want of artificial canals for irrigation. In the palmier Afghan days, however, of more than one of their Padshahs of Delhi, prominently Feroz Shah, who reigned in the second half of the fourteenth century, canal building was a favourite occupation, but after the fatal invasion of Taimur, it seems to have been totally abandoned.

The main Muhammedan kingdoms in Hindustan besides the kingdom of Delhi, which, save at its worst, always included the Punjab as an appanage, were Jaunpore, Bengal, Malwa and Gujarat. Of these Jaunpore did not exist in the days of Baber, it having been, as I have already related, conquered by Sekunder Lodi; only the weakness of the central power of Delhi allowed it to spring into existence and as soon as this power became at all strong, the kingdom of Jaunpore ceased to exist. Thus it flourished most vigorously during the feeble reign of the Sayids at Delhi. After the departure of Taimur it extended in the North-West over Modern Oudh and in the South-East over Modern Behar. Various remains, including a magnificent mosque at Jaunpore, still exist, and from this we may learn that the Rulers of these kingdoms were like other Muhammedan Rulers great and capable builders. Bengal had really a separate existence almost from the days of the first Muhammedan conquerors in the beginning of the thirteenth century. This kingdom sometimes extended into Behar which, however, was taken from it more than once by the Rulers of Jaunpore and of Delhi. The Pathan settlers in Bengal were perhaps less in touch with the people than those of any other part of India. They seem to have been quite content, provided they obtained sufficient tribute, to leave the Hindu population entirely to their own way. In some things indeed aboriginal influences must have gained its way even among the Pathans. The custom noted by Mr. Fraser in his Golden Bough and which is certain pre-Islamic was maintained there, that any one who could slay the King himself became King. Nowhere in India was the detachment of the Hindu mind from the things of this world more complete than in Bengal, and it was during the rule of the Muhammedan Rulers there in the latter part of the fifteenth century that Chaitaniya taught his doctrines of reformed Vaishnavism:—

The East bowed low before the blast,
In patient deep disdain ;
She let the legions thunder past,
And plunged in thought again.

Chaitaniya taught Theism which is compatible with Hinduism and the abolition of caste which one would think is not ; but such is the eclectic influence of the Hindu religion that vast numbers of Bengalees are followers of Chaitaniya and still remain Hindus. In the Punjab a similar movement resulted about this time in Sikhism which, though descended from Hinduism, is absolutely distinct therefrom.

The Punjab, Delhi, Jaunpore and Bengal are provinces continuous from the Indus to the Bay of Bengal. South of the Punjab and Delhi is Rajputana and South of Rajputana are Malwa and Gujarat. These kingdoms which became separate early in the fourteenth century and which contain some of the most fertile parts of India did not have a constant flow of adventurers from the North-Western Frontier such as poured into the Punjab and by way of Delhi further East. Muhammedan life in these kingdoms became more and more Indian and though the North-West stream of immigrants never quite ceased, even in them, yet the foundation of their power was rather by reason of immigration from the kingdoms of the Deccan upwards rather than from Central Asia downwards. Gujarat itself bordering the sea was largely effected by Arabs and other Western Muhammedans. These two kingdoms seem to have got on the whole very well with their Hindu neighbours further North though they both and Malwa particularly had occasional wars with their Rajputana neighbours. To complete the circuit one comes to Sind, which a little before the time of Baber, had been seized by the Arghuns whom I have mentioned as ruling in Kandahar. Sind had been invaded by a Muhammedan conqueror within a hundred years of the Hijira, and ever since had been more or less a Muhammedan country. In no other part of Hindustan had the people become more thoroughly impregnated with the doctrine of Islam. A hot, sandy country, not unlike Arabia, its peoples have, from the first Muhammedan invasions, ever taken kindly to the doctrine and ways of Islam.

Edged in as a block between these Muhammedan kingdoms is Rajputana. There alone in Hindustan (India North of the Vindhya) was the Hindu Ruler. No foreign influence had modified this rule. The Rajput had formerly reigned over much of Hindustan, and at the time of the great Muhammedan invasion at the end of the twelfth century the two great kingdoms of Hindustan were Delhi and Kanouj in both of which Rajputs reigned. Internal dissensions helped to bring about the great defeat by Shahab-ud-din of Prithvi Raj, the Delhi King, at Thanesar in 1193 A.D. After that fatal day, no more did Rajput rule on the bank of the Ganges or its great affluent, the Jumna. As Rulers this race were driven to the confines of Rajputana. Part of Scindia's and Holkar's present domains were included in this land in the time of which I write. Otherwise Rajputana then was very much the same stretch of country as the Rajputana of the present day. This may be divided into two parts: the Northern, mainly sandy, and the Southern, hilly with woodland and pastoral land and some, though not a very great quantity of arable land. The hills which are the backbone of this Southern part are known as the Aravalli. On Mount Abu, one of the summits of this range, the British Resident of Rajputana now spends the hottest month of the year. The Rajputs themselves have had their history most sympathetically told by Colonel Todd, who in the earlier part of last century was for many years Political Agent of the British Governor-General accredited to the Chieftains of Rajputana. As to their origin, it is needless to go into the fanciful stories told by him, but it is almost certain that they are not descendants of the earliest Aryan invaders of Hindustan. In thoughts, religious ideas and ways of life they differ notably not only from the Brahmins of the rest of Hindustan, but also from the high castemen to be found within the watershed of the Ganges. Chivalrous, thoughtless, without a care for the morrow, with a degree of self-respect which rises superior to death, the Rajput can hardly be compared to any other Eastern or indeed any other race. Having his land in the middle of hostile Muhammedan kingdoms, often warring with them, often defeated, he has managed to survive and to survive as a ruler through it all. When we reach Akbar's reign, we will see how the latter attempted to league himself with his race and to make them the sheet anchor of his policy ; we will learn how far he succeeded and how far he failed ; later on we will find this policy followed by his two successors only to be cast aside by Aurangzeb, and we will find that this casting aside was one of the causes of the decay of the great Moghul Empire. The chief State in Rajputana was Chitore, ruled by the Sesodias. The Rulers of this State trace their ancestry back with historical accuracy to the time when the Roman Empire was at its height ; a marriage connection with one of the Byzantine Emperors is recorded in its annals. But its position as the incessant foe of the Moslem is its chief title to fame. The Moghuls of Delhi never married a daughter of this race. Chitore was stormed by Muhammedan Rulers more than once and finally yielded its place as capital in favour of Udaipur, but when the Chitore Rajput could not withstand the foe in fort or plain, he retired to the mountains and carried on the eternal strife. The Maharaja of Udaipur is to this day considered the premier Rajput Ruler of India, and amongst Hindus at least is more deeply respected and revered than the Rulers of States, the creation of Moghul India, though in rank and power he may not be able to compare with these.

In one part of peninsular India at the time of Baber's arrival in Hindustan there were five Muhammedan kingdoms. These adjoined each other in the North-Western part of the Peninsula occupying a great portion of the present Bombay Presidency and a part of the present Central Provinces and Nizam's Dominions. The rest of the Peninsula was ruled over by Hindu or semi-Hindu Rulers.

Muhammedan connection with the Peninsula which is commonly and generally called by Muhammedan writers the Deccan (South) commenced at the end of the thirteenth century when Alauddin, one of the most ferocious of the Muhammedan Rulers of Delhi, raided this country on the most enormous scale reaching as far as Cape Comorin. Thirty years later Muhammad Tugluk, one of the most extraordinary and fantastic kings that ever reigned in Delhi, took into his head to transfer his capital from that place to Deogiri in the extreme North of the Peninsula, which he named Daulatabad. The people of Delhi were driven as captives from their homes to colonise a new metropolis. It is hardly necessary to state that the attempt failed.

The Rulers at Delhi had never anything more but the very slightest hold of any part of India South of the Vindhya mountains. In the middle of the fourteenth century a Delhi Muhammedan, named Hassain, who is described as having been a servant of a Brahmin and who was very probably of Brahmin parentage, founded a dynasty known as the Bahmini in the North-West of the Deccan, which existed for over one hundred and fifty years. This kingdom in its earlier days reached a high degree of prosperity, Hindus taking a very important part in its affairs, and it seems to have been much more impregnated with Hindu methods of governing than the Muhammedan kingdoms of Hindustan. The Muhammedan Nobles and soldiers of this kingdom were largely of Abyssinian, Arabian and Persian Gulf origin. We find, indeed, the name Moghul used over and over again as describing the nationality of the troops or of the Nobles, but Moghul has for centuries in the past in India simply meant foreigners from the West. The word Turk is indeed fairly frequently used' in the history of the Deccan, and where we find it we may be sure that the writer is speaking of the races of Turkistan or of Moghulistan, but the word Moghul has not at all the same significance.

By the time the fifteenth century had, however, fairly set in, the original vigour of the family had much abated, and the Bahmini annals during this century are one long history of civil wars, of cruelty and debauchery. Two parties in the State seems to have ever been at variance, the one consisting of the foreigners, and the other of the Deccan-born Muhammedans. These two factors were ever quarrelling and massacring each other. Before the century was over, the Bahmini kingdom fell to pieces, and five smaller kingdoms were founded by Nobles of the kingdom, viz., the Adil Shahi of Bijapur, the Nizam Shahi of Ahmadnuggur, the Kutb Shahi of Golkonda and the Ahmad Shahi of Berar and the Barid Shahi of Bedar. The last two of these were but short-lived and never rose to be of great importance, but the first three became lasting kingdoms and we shall hear of them hereafter. A curious story is told by Ferishta as to the use of the umbrella in the Deccan. The founders of these kingdoms originally pretended to be simply Ministers of the faineant Bahmini kingdoms. The umbrella in the East has always been the sign of royalty. The founder of the Ahmad Shahi dynasty had, when he went abroad, placed a white umbrella over his head. His officers objected and he excused himself by saying that he used the umbrella only to shelter himself from the sun and not as a sign of royalty. To this they replied that if this was the case, they had no objection, provided general leave were given to them, and all his subjects also to use umbrellas. Such permission was given, and as Ferishta says from that time to this the King and the people alike in the Deccan carry their umbrellas over their heads, the King's being distinguished by having a piece of red on its top, all the others being white. Under the kingdom of Delhi no one save royalty ever dared to use an umbrella. It is only with the advent of British rule that an umbrella, save to protect royalty, has come to be seen in the streets of Agra and Delhi.

The West Coast of India has since very remote times carried on a considerable commerce with the ports of Arabia and with the Persian Gulf, and not only in this way did many Arabs, Abyssinians and Persians find their way to India, but Western inventions found their way there also long before they reached inland Delhi. Thus we read of artillery worked by Europeans and Turks for one of the Bahmini Kings in the second half of the fourteenth century, within 50 years of the battle of Cressy.

The kings of the Bahmini dynasty and of the dynasties that succeeded it were, as regards morals, considerably worse than the Rulers at Delhi. Patricide was not uncommon; fratricide general; cruelty of the most brutal nature, a love of punishing by torture, seem to have been very common. Many of the kings seem to have drunk more heavily even than Baber and with none of the joviality which redeemed so largely Baber's debauches. Inordinate sensuality, unnatural lust, eunuchs often being the leading persons in the kingdom, mark the later reigns of this race. At the same time we constantly read of these kings being good Muhammedans, omitting on no account their five daily prayers. When the five dynasties came into existence, there was continually a change from Sunni to the Shiah faith and then a reversion—facts which would show that theology if not morality was to be found in abundance at the Courts. In spite of the low character of the kings and although famines and though plague now and again wasted the land, on the whole the picture of the Deccan in the fifteenth century and the first half of the sixteenth century as given us by Ferishta is that of marked prosperity. For instance he tells us of the founding of Ahmadnuggur in 1493 A.D. and how in two years it rivalled Baghdad and Cairo. The Mahrattas (called by him generally Bergas) are frequently mentioned by this writer. The tactics in warfare which they subsequently adopted, such as the holding of fortresses, the declining general actions, the cutting off of the enemy's supplies, were the regular tactics of the Muhammedan Kings of the Deccan long before the Mahrattas had any political existence.

Only a comparative small part of the Deccan belonged to the Muhammedan Rulers. Outside the North-West corner, throughout the whole of the present Presidency of Madras, the Southern parts of the Presidency in Bombay and the whole of the extreme South was ruled by Hindu Rulers. Hinduism in most of India has been a faith superimposed upon more primary faiths, and in the greater part of Southern India this superimposition, largely connected with the name of Sankhara Acharya, was comparatively modern, for when Baber became the Padshah of Delhi, traces of an older state of society and religion than the Hindu in many places were still to be found. In Calicut the king-killing custom referred to already as prevalent in Bengal, is mentioned by Muhammedan writers as having been in force. Probably, if we knew more of history of Southern India, we would find this custom in many other principalities of the numerous kingdoms which stretched down the West Coast. In the South no Hindu kingdom was more famous than the kingdoms of Bijanaggur. Its name is mainly preserved in history on account of its Rulers' endless wars with the Muhammedan Rulers further North; the greatness of its capital town in the days of its prosperity is praised by Muhammedan writers, and that this praise is not without foundation is evident from the enormous ruins of the city which still exist, though the city itself was taken and destroyed by the Muhammedans more than three centuries ago. Its boundaries stretched as far North at the end of the fifteenth century as Goa, which was its Northern port, and South it stretched almost to the very limit of the Peninsula. Its riches and the number of its inhabitants seem to have been enormous. For seven centuries before Baber's accession, one family had ruled this kingdom. The Minister of the last reigning member of the family succeeded by fraud, and from that day its prosperity seems to have been on the wane.

A Muhammedan writer, Abdur Razzak, who came on some State business from the Ruler of Samarkand to Southern India in the fifteenth century, gives in the Matlau Sadain a most interesting account of Calicut and Bijanaggur. He starts from Ormuz in the Persian Gulf, in the fifteenth century one of the greatest marts in the East for Calicut, but is first of all carried to Muscat on the Arabian Coast, on which coast he had to stay for months. Finally in the fair weather he sails from an Arabian port called by him Kariat and reaches Calicut in seventeen days. At Calicut he is struck mainly by two things, the extent of the commerce and the want of clothing worn by the inhabitants. From China to Eastern Africa, ships had their rendezvous at Calicut. Its chief exportation was pepper. King and peasant went alike almost totally naked. He also notices the custom of polyandry, vestiges of which are to be found in the customs of the modern Nairs. I should mention here that Ferishta tells us that in parts of the Western Coasts not only had a woman many husbands, but she also took the leading part in affairs.

At Bijanaggur the size of the city strikes his admiration. "The city of Bijanaggur is such that eye has not seen nor ear heard of any place resembling it upon the whole earth. It is so built that it has seven fortified walls one within the other.

"All the inhabitants whether high or low, even down to the artificers of the bazaar, wear jewels and gold ornaments in their ears and around their necks, arms, wrists and fingers." The wages of the police he tells us were defrayed by a tax on brothels.

Before Baber had won the battle of Paniput, the Portuguese were on the Western shores. First of the European nations to gain the sea trade of India with the West, nearly twenty years before Baber's arrival, they had established themselves as a great sea-power in Western India. Goa was in A.D. 1526 in the height of its greatness. And from this far off time when Europeans seized by reason of their sea-power a portion of India, they have never left go. Long did they lie low, but the ports and the seas being theirs, they have been able mainly through the power of their trade to hold on until the whole of India has become theirs. They have seen the Moghul, in some ways the mightiest of Eastern Empires, come and go; but they have remained. This centre fact must be remembered that they were actually in India, organising an Empire, before Baber with his few thousand of hardy Turkish warriors invaded the plains of India. Both Baber's force and the Portuguese flotillas seemed but small agents to conquer a mighty continent. But both succeeded; the Portuguese power eventually merging into the power of other European nations and finally into that of the English. The slower to travel, the more certain to the result, and as far as modern eye can see at this day, there are only two possible powers which can rule Modern India; both are without it. The Russian with his oriental affinities, with his enormous armies, with his Eastern qualities—the great Northern land-power; and Britain on the other hand with her world-stretching commerce, with her myriad ships and with her power of ever imposing fresh Western ocean-borne life. What is in the future is hidden from mortal eye; but Britain, if it will remember the statesman's saying that India is more likely to be lost at Westminster than in India itself, may well take courage and comfort from the past.

---

CHAPTER VI.

BABER'S REIGN AT DELHI, 1526—1530

THE spoil taken at Delhi and Agra was great. In the fort at the latter place were the wives, children and some of the chief followers of the Hindu Rana of Gwalior kept as hostages there by Ibrahim Lodi. Humayun, Baber's eldest son, seized them as they were escaping and preserved them from being plundered. To show their gratitude they presented him with a magnificent present of jewels and precious stones, including a diamond, valued by Tavernier, a French traveller, a century and a half later at £880,000. This diamond was long the chief ornament in the Moghul's Crown, rich as this became beyond all other crowns. The booty was divided by Baber with a free hand; so much so that Baber was given the nickname of the Kalender—a name well enough known to all from the Arabian Nights—a voluntary beggar. But, although he was thus lavish in his gifts, he did not thereby reconcile his chiefs to stay in the country they had conquered. They looked on the expedition as one similar to that of Taimur's more than a century ago, one with plenty of fighting and plenty of loot and then a return from the torrid plains of Hindustan to the cool highlands of Afghanistan and Central Asia. Nor did Baber's position invite them to stay. He held Delhi and Agra it is true; but everywhere around swarmed enemies or what the later Muhammedan historians would name rebels. The Afghans had ruled the greater part of Hindustan for more than three centuries and had no intention to make way for the Chagatai Turks. Unpopular Ibrahim had been, but with him out of the way they were quite prepared to accept and did for a time accept Sultan Mahmud Lodi, a brother of Ibrahim, as their leader and king. Agra had been taken in the hot weather in the month of May, when outdoor life is a burden and when the sun was Baber's Army's worst foe. I have already stated what Baber himself has written about the plains of India, about their ugliness and the ugliness of the people. No wonder then that his followers wanted to return to the cool shades of Kabul, to the cypresses and running waters of highland Afghanistan. Against all this Baber absolutely set his face. Calling his chiefs into Council he stated that after the labours of many years they had achieved the conquest of the Kingdoms they now held, and added :* "And now, what force compels, and what hardship obliges us, without any visible cause, after having worn out our life in accomplishing the desired achievement, to abandon and fly from our conquests, and to retreat back to Kabul with every symptom of disappointment and discomfiture? Let not any one who calls himself my friend ever henceforward make such a proposal. But if there is any among you who cannot bring himself to stay, or to give up his purpose of returning back, let him depart."

To this appeal—urged as it was by one having such a personality as Baber—there could only be one answer. Willing or unwilling, the chiefs determined to remain. Khwajeh Khan, one of the principal, however, was sent on some ostensible business back to Afghanistan. He had been one of the chief or the discontented. When leaving Delhi he wrote on a wall of Delhi the following couplet :—

* Baber's Memoirs. p. 336.

If I pass the Sind safe and sound,
May shame take me if I ever again wish for Hind.*

To which Baber sent him the following satiric reply :

Return a hundred thanks, O Baber, for the bounty of the merciful God

Has given you Sind, Hind, and numerous kingdoms ;

If unable to stand the heat, you long for cold ;

You have only to recollect the frost and cold of Ghazni.

---

CHAPTER VII.

BABER'S determination had the best results. The Afghan and other Chieftains in the vicinity of Delhi and Agra, when they found that Baber had come to settle, thought it best to submit. Rohilkund, then known as Sambhal, quickly fell into his power, and he soon possessed a consolidated kingdom as far as the latitude of Agra. The Eastern Afghans, most of whom had been vassals of the Jaunpore kingdom, were dispersed without any serious fighting and his son Humayun took possession of Jaunpore. Kalpi, then a town of the greatest importance as being one of the regular fords of the Jumna, also fell into his hands, and by the end of the year he had become ruler of the Doab, the country between the Jumna and the Ganges down as far Allaha-bad ; he also had slighter but yet considerable control over the country East and North of the Ganges.

It was about this time that the fort of Gwafiar fell into his hands. Tatar Khan Sarang Khani was the ruler of this fort, one of the strongest in Upper India, and one which had always been considered by the Indians as impregnable. I shall presently speak of the Rajput Power with which Baber had in subsequent times to contend. At the present I need only say that Rana Sanga of Mewar, one of the greatest Rajput Chiefs that had ever reigned in any part of India since the Twelfth Century, was pressing on the Muhammedan powers to the South and East of Rajasthan, and threatened Tatar Khan in Gwalior itself, although this fort was not very distant from Agra, one of the great centres of the Muhammedan power. Of the two, the Turk and the Rajput, Tatar Khan preferred the former, though naturally he would rather have been the servant of neither. Anyhow finding himself pushed by Rana Sanga, he applied to Baber for protection. This latter sent Rahimdad, an officer of his, to Gwalior. On his arrival there he, however, found that Tatar Khan did not admit him into the fort and that he was not strong enough to take forcible possession of the place. A Dervesh of the place Shah Muhammed Husain sent a message to Rahimdad telling him that Tatar Khan had no intention to give up the place and that he should attempt to seize it no matter how. Accordingly Rahimdad begged that he and a few of his servants might be admitted into the fort and that his soldiers should be allowed to encamp close outside the walls alleging as his reason his fear of being attacked by Rana Sanga. This Tatar Khan allowed; then Rahimdad applied to have certain of his followers stationed at the gate along with Tatar's Guard. This too was allowed. The natural consequence followed, his men poured in until Tatar Khan found that he had no option but to give up the fort. Baber received Tatar Khan kindly at Agra and granted him a Jagir.

---

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 337.

Up to now, since the battle of Paniput, Baber had been contending with co-religionists of his, but he had now to meet a very different foe. Rana Sanga had an extraordinary career. The eldest son of Rai Mul, King of Mewar, during the large period of his youth he was self-exiled from his own country to avoid the enmity of his younger brother Pirthi Raj. Todd tells us the following story illustrative of Rajput manners about him and his two younger brothers.

*“ The three brothers, with their uncle, Soorajmul, were one day discussing these topics, when Sanga observed that, though heir to the ten thousand towns of Mewar, he would wave his claims, and trust them, as did the Roman brother, to the omen which should be given by the priestess of Charuni Devi at Nahra Mungro, the "Tiger's Mount." They repaired to her abode. Pirthi Raj and Jeimal entered first, and seated themselves on a pallet; Sanga followed and took possession of the panther hide of the prophetess; his uncle, Soorajmul, with one knee resting thereon. Scarcely had Pirthi Raj disclosed their errand, when the Sybil pointed to the panther hide as the decisive omen of sovereignty to Sanga, with a portion to his uncle. They received the decree as did the twins of Rome. Pirthi Raj drew his sword and would have falsified the omen, had not Soorajmul stepped in and received the blow destined for Sanga, while the prophetess fled from their fury. Soorajmul and Pirthi Raj were exhausted with wounds, and Sanga fled with five sword cuts and an arrow in his eye, which destroyed the sight for ever. He made for the sanctuary of Chutturbhooja and passing Sevantee, took refuge with Beeda (Oodawut), who was accoutred for a journey, his steed standing by him. Scarcely had he assisted the wounded heir of Mewar to alight then Jeimal galloped up in pursuit. The Rahtore guarded the sanctuary and gave up his life in defence of his guest, who meanwhile escaped."

* Todd, Rajasthan, Vol. I, pp. 245, 246.

After this event there were constant quarrels between Jeimal and his uncle Soorajmul. In these Rana Sanga took no part. His two brothers met with violent deaths, one being slain by a father whose daughter he attempted to violate and the other being poisoned by his brother-in-law. The uncle left Mewar for ever and Rana Sanga ascended the throne of Mewar in peace in the year 1509 A.D. He warred with the Lodi Sovereigns of Delhi and defeated them as well as the Malwa rulers of the South; much of the latter's country he conquered; and so he became recognised within a very short space of time as the Lord Paramount of Rajasthan. Pressing Eastward he took Rantambhor, one of the great march fortresses of Muhammedan India facing the land of the Rajputs, South and West of the Jumna, and threatened as we have already said, Gwalior. When Baber became ruler at Agra, he found Sanga's territory extending to within a very short distance of its gates. The Rana was aided in his war against Baber by various Afghan Chiefs, the principal of whom was Hasan Khan Mewati of Ulwar, who preferred his country to his religion. In all the wars indeed between Hindus and Muhammedans, from the time of Baber down, we find certain Muhammedan chiefs who have preferred fighting for their country rather than for their co-religionists, but such chiefs have always been few. With the Muhammedan of India, as the Muhammedan of elsewhere, creed makes a stronger appeal than country.

The war opened unfortunately. Sanga was near Biana when the garrison of that place sallied out and was defeated. An advance guard sent by Baber himself was also routed the same day. After this Baber found it necessary to pitch his camp at Sikri, now known as Fatehpur Sikri. From there another detachment under the lead of Abdul Aziz, having advanced imprudently, was also cut up. The consequences were disastrous. Baber found himself confined to his camp, and was forced strongly to entrench himself, chaining together guns and fortifying the parts of his camp unprotected by them (for he had but a few) with an elaborate system of ropes made from twisted leather. Rana Sanga's light troops scoured the country, provisions ran short and in a fortnight's time his position to him seemed almost desperate. As he tells us in his Memoirs, general consternation and alarm prevailed among his followers, both great and small. In such a state Baber had resort to what many other great leaders have in similar cases done. He made a most powerful appeal to his soldiers, alike to their sense of honour and to their religious feelings.

Calling together an assembly he addressed them as follows :—

* “ Noblemen and Soldiers : Every man that comes into the world is subject to dissolution. When we are passed away and gone, God only survives, unchangeable. Whoever comes to the feast of life, must, before it is over, drink from the cup of death. He who arrives at the inn of mortality, must one day inevitably take his departure from that house of sorrow—the world. How much better is it to die with honour than to live with infamy.

---

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 357.

With fame, even if I die, I am content ;
Let fame be mine, since my body is Death.

The most High God has been propitious to us, and has now placed us in such a crisis, that if we fail in the field, we die the death of martyrs ; if we survive, we rise victorious, the avengers of the cause of God. Let us, then with one accord, swear on God's Holy Word, that none of us will ever think of turning his face from this warfare, nor desert from the battle and slaughter that ensues, till his soul is separated from his body."

The effect was magical. One and all seized the Korans and swore that they would conquer or die ; at the same time to show that his reformation was sincere, Baber broke all his wine cups, poured out his wine, and as we never read of his drinking again, we may conclude that from the date of the battle of Sikri or battle of Kanwa as it is called by Erskine, Baber became a total abstainer from all strong drinks. The details of the * battle that followed are differently given by Baber and by the Annalists of Rajputana, but both agree that it commenced with a desperate charge by the Rajputs on Baber's right. Both agree that the Rajputs charged both on the right and left most desperately, driving their charges well home, and that it was only after a protracted battle of hours that they gave way, but whereas Baber ascribes his victory to the action of his centre where he had his guns, the Rajput Annalists describe Sanga's defeat to the treachery of a Rajput chief. In any case the rout was complete. Hasan Khan Mewati, the leader of the Western Afghans, was killed, so also were the representatives of almost every great Rajput family throughout Rajputana and never again during the generation of Baber and Sanga were the Rajputs ever able to take their offensive against the Delhi power. Great pyramids of the skulls of the slain were raised by the victors. From the date of that fight Baber took the title most dear to all * Erskine quoting from Baber's Memoirs and Todd says they differ as to the date of the battle. Baber in his Memoirs stating it as February 1527 and Todd November 1528.

Muhammedan conquerors, that of Ghazi (conqueror of infidels). One more fight Baber had with the Rajputs when he stormed one of their strong fortresses Chanderi. This was held by Medini Rao, one of the most important local chiefs who had been serving under Rana Sanga. The outer fort was easily taken. The citadel caused more difficulty; when the Rajputs saw that all was lost they acted as Rajputs on various occasions have done in similar cases. Baber writes:—

* “ In a short time the Pagans, in a state of complete nudity, rushed out to attack us, put numbers of my people to flight, and leaped over the ramparts. Some of our troops were attacked furiously and put to the sword. The reason of this desperate sally from their works was, that, on giving up the place for lost, they had put to death the whole of their wives and women, and having resolved to perish, had stripped themselves naked in which condition they had rushed out to the fight; and, engaging with ungovernable desperation, drove our people along the ramparts. Two or three hundred Pagans had entered Medini Rao's house, where numbers of them slew each other, in the following manner: One person took his stand with a sword in his hand, while the others, one by one, crowded in and stretched out their necks, eager to die. In this way many went to hell.”

We read of no further fighting between the Moghuls and the Rajputs during this reign.

---

CHAPTER VIII.

AFTER his campaign against Rana Sanga, Baber sent his eldest son Humayun back to Kabul. On his way Humayun went to Delhi and forcibly took possession of some treasure he found there. This made Baber very angry and he wrote to him letters full of the severest reproaches. Baber in his Memoirs records a later letter written to Humayun, which is so human in its paternal mingling of affection and admonition, that I have no hesitation in making a considerable extract thereupon.

---

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 377.

"I have some quarrels to settle with you.* For two or three years past, none of your people have waited on me from you, and the messenger whom I sent to you did not come back to me for a twelve month. This, remember, is undeniable.

In many of your letters you complain of separation from your friends. It is wrong for a prince to indulge in such a complaint, for there is a saying—

If you are fettered by your situation,

Submit to circumstances.

If you are independent, follow your own fancy.

There is no greater bondage than that in which a king is placed, and it ill becomes him to complain of inevitable separation.

In compliance with my wishes, you have indeed written me letters, but you certainly never read them over; for had you attempted to read them, you must have found it absolutely impossible, and would then undoubtedly have put them by. I contrived indeed to decipher and comprehend the meaning of your last letter, but with much difficulty. It is excessively confused and crabbed. Whoever saw a Moamma (a riddle or a charade) in prose? Your spelling is not bad, yet not quite correct. You have written iltafat with a toe (instead of a te), and kuling with a ke (instead of a kaf). Your letter may indeed be read; but in consequence of the far-fetched words you have employed, the meaning is by no means very intelligible. You certainly do not excel in letter-writing, and fail chiefly because you have too great a desire to show your acquirements. For the future, you should write unaffectedly, with clearness, using plain words, which would cost less trouble both to the writer and reader.

If you are desirous of gaining my approbation, you must not waste your time in private parties, but rather indulge in liberal conversation and frank intercourse with all about you. Twice every day you must call your brothers and Beks to your presence, not leaving their attendance to their own discretion; and after consulting with them about any business that occurs, you must finally act as may be decided to be most advisable."

---

* Baber's Memoirs, pp. 391—392.

The Eastern Afghans still gave great trouble and Baber had to undertake more than one campaign against them. In the first campaign A.D. 1528 which was on the Ganges, he threw a bridge across the river at Kanauj whereon the enemy after very slight fighting dispersed. In the second campaign which was of a more protracted nature, the most important event was the passage of the Gogra. Having crossed the Ganges more than once on his Eastern route and having taken Benares and Ghazipur, he finally proceeded by the Southern and Western bank to a place opposite where the Gogra from the North-West flows into the Ganges. The Afghans who were mainly the nobles of the Eastern Kingdom of Jaunpore had joined with the King of Bengal who had taken advantage of the state of the country to conquer Tirhut. Some of the Delhi Army under Baber's son Askari was on the left side of the Ganges and by a cleverly-concerted movement, this army crossed the Gogra at a point higher than the enemy and having done so proceeded to attack it, while Baber with other troops crossed the Ganges lower down. This battle which took place on the 6th of May 1529 was decisive. The Afghans were completely routed. Many of their leaders submitted, and the Bengal King hastened to conclude a peace. Those that still held out, were no longer able to stand before the concentrated Delhi force, and the last year of Baber's reign was free from any thing like serious warfare.

In his Memoirs he mentions in connection with this Eastern war his experience of gun-making and of artillery in action. Ustad Ali Rumi his artificer's first attempts at gun-making were not very successful. Ustad's big gun burst, killing eight people. Then he makes another which he names Dig Gazi (the victorious gun). He brings it into action and, as Baber remarks, "does very well with it. On the first day he discharged it eight times, the second day sixteen times, and for three or four days continued firing in the same way."

On his way back to Agra from the wars Baber stopped at Gwalior which he greatly admires. The following is his description of it :—

*“ Next morning, before noonday prayers, I mounted, and rode out to visit the rising grounds to the North of Gwalior, and having seen them and the chapels and religious places, I entered Gwalior by the Hatipul-gate, which is close by Rajah Mansing's palace, and proceeded to Raja Bikermajit's palace, where Rahimdad had resided, and alighted there just as afternoon prayers were over. The same night, on account of the pain in my ear, and as it was moonshine, I took some opium. Next morning the sickness that followed the effects of the opium was very oppressive, and I vomited a good deal. In spite of my sickness I went over all the palaces of Mansing and Bikermajit. They are singularly beautiful palaces, though built in different patches, and without regular plan. They are wholly of hewn stone. The palace of Mansing is more lofty and splendid than that of any of the other Rajas. One part of the wall of Mansing's palace fronts the East, and this portion of it is more highly adorned than the rest. It may be about forty or fifty gez in height,* and is entirely of hewn stone. Its front is overlaid with white stucco. The buildings are in many parts four stories in height. The two lower floors are very dark, but, after sitting a while in them, you can see distinctly enough. I went through them, taking a light with me. In one division of this palace, there is a building with five domes, and round about them a number of smaller domes; the small domes are one on each side of the greater, according to the custom of Hindustan. The five large domes are covered with plates of copper gilt. The outside of the walls they have inlaid with green painted tiles. All around they have inlaid the walls with figures of plantain trees, made of painted tiles. In the tower of the Eastern division is the Hatipul. They call an elephant hati, and a gate pul. On the outside of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it. It is a perfect resemblance of an elephant, and hence the gate is called Hatipul. The lowest story of the house, which is four stories high, has a window that looks towards this figure of an elephant, which is close by it. On its upper story are the same sort of small domes that have been described. In the second story are the sitting apartments. You descend into these apartments, as well as to those last mentioned. Though they have had all the ingenuity of Hindustan bestowed on them, yet they are but uncomfortable places."

* Habers Memoirs, pp. 383—84.

Bikermajit, the old ruler of the place, whose females Humayun had protected, at this time yielded to Baber the strong fort of Rantanbhor. With this the Military history of his reign comes to an end. He had the satisfaction, however, of learning before his death that his old enemies the Uzbegs had been totally defeated by Shah Jehan.

From Badakshan this news was brought by express post in 11 days to Agra. Baber had taken great pains after his conquest of Delhi to lay out a good road to Kabul and the West. Regular relays of runners were stationed on it, and serais and mosques were built at fixed intervals.

The story of the death of Baber is like that of his life, human to the last degree. Before passing to this, I must quote a few lines from the last letter written by him to a friend.

* "In the present year praise be to God, these troubles are over, and I ascribe them chiefly to the occupation afforded to my mind by a poetical translation, on which I have employed myself. Let me advise you too, to adopt a life of abstinence. Social parties and wine are pleasant, in company with our jolly friends and old boon companions. But with whom can you enjoy the social cup? with whom can you indulge in the pleasures of wine? If you have only Shir Ahmed and Haider Kuli for the companions of your gay hours and jovial goblet, you can surely find no great difficulty in consenting to the sacrifice."

Humayun, his eldest son who had returned to India, fell ill and the Doctors despaired of his life; at this time one of Baber's friends happened to say that when human help failed, God had in times past accepted an offering of the most valuable thing the sufferer possessed and had restored the sick person to health. Baber thereupon declared that his life was Humayun's dearest treasure and in spite of all attempts to dissuade him from making the offering, he retiring into his private apartment, prayed earnestly and then solemnly walked round the sick prince's bed three times. He then was heard to say that he had prevailed and that his son was saved, a beautiful story whether true or not. Anyhow Humayun recovered and shortly afterwards Baber died on the 26th day of December 1530. He is buried near Kabul with a running stream close by, near the town and country he so deeply loved. He was not the greatest but he was by far the most human of Eastern Conquerors; no stilted stiffness such as to be found in Taimur's Memoirs and indeed in almost all Eastern Chronicles are to be found in his life's story as told by himself, and whatever else one may think of him, we cannot rise from this story without a profound liking for this big hearted jovial tempered giant, who hides none of his frailties or of his sensuality and who does not attempt to make himself in any way superior to the general race of man.

* Baber's Memoirs, p. 403.

CHAPTER IX.

HUMAYUN.

BABER was the chief bond of union connecting the mixed horde that had followed him to India. Most of his followers were Chagatai Turks, persons who either themselves or whose immediate ancestors had come from the regions North of the Oxus. Along with these were also numerous adventurers of every kind, polished Persians, rude sons of the steppes and desert, who either with the hope of plunder or on account of fidelity to their gallant leader had followed the latter across the Indus to the conquest of Delhi and Agra. Their total number was comparatively small, probably not more than twenty thousand adult fighting men in all. As far as plunder went, many had got all that their hearts could desire. Baber was, as I have already stated, called the Kalender from the profuse fashion in which he distributed the spoils which he gained in his conquests to his comrades and soldiery. Most of these latter, it is safe to say, hated the country and would have much rather been in smiling Kabul or in their Transoxiana homes. Afghanistan and Turkistan, as are now called the countries from which these men came, are indeed in parts very hot in summer. But though the thermometer may often at times stand high, the heat at its worst is more easy to be endured than the heat of India owing to its being so dry, and then the season of excessive warmth is short and for most of the year, the greater part of these countries have a most enjoyable climate; whereas in Upper India more than half the year the weather is, especially to a foreigner, the very reverse of pleasant. Besides, as Baber remarks in his Memoirs, Upper India is exceedingly ugly; at least it appears so to people whose life has been spent amongst mountains and mountain streams. The rains Baber describes as the pleasantest time of the year, and this because then alone in the dust covered plains of the Punjab and the Ganges Doab is one's eye soothed by green verdure. Baber's influence had kept this motley crowd in India. What would they do now that he was gone? Would they, like Khwajah Kalan of whom I have written, hurry back to their hills, invoking curses on their heads if they ever again crossed the Indus stream. They were a small band of foreigners, much as the English were a little over two centuries later, amidst an enormous alien population. Inertia, the want of leaders led them to stay where they were; but their hold on the country was very slight, and if there had been any cohesion, any real central rallying point against the natives of the land, they would have been turned out and turned out forever. Fortunately for them, as fortunately for the English later on, there was no such rallying point. The great mass of the people were Hindus, and they, save the Rajputs, cared nought as to who should rule them. Anybody might do so, provided he left their religious, social and economic organisation alone. As to taxes, frugal as the inhabitants of India were (and still are) a very little did for them, and even if this little was reduced, it was easier to submit, even to die, than to fight. As for the Rajputs, since the day that Prithvi Raj had lost his life and the sovereignty of Delhi more than three centuries back, the Lordship of the deserts of Rajputana with its few fruitful oases was enough for them, and this the Muhammedans did not covet. Only occasionally did Rajput chiefs push further, when a more enterprising Mewar chief than usual would invade and plunder parts of Malwa or Gujarat or may be threaten the Gangetic Doab itself. But such energy was but intermittent, and before Baber's death all fear of attacks from the Rajputs on the Delhi Kingdom had ceased with the great rout of Fatehpur Sikri. So the Moghul Emperors had really only the Muhammedans of the country and their fellow Moghuls with whom to deal. Most of the former had been in the country for generations and had lost much of their virility as foreign settlers commonly do in the Indian plains. It must be remembered too that neither the Muhammedan religion nor Muhammedan public feeling ordinarily reprobates marriage with women of any race whatsoever, that an Indian wealthy Muhammedan's harem would contain ordinarily largely women of the country (and low caste women too, who more easily become nominal Mussalmans), and it can well be understood that the descendants of the large limbed races of Afghanistan became in course of time hardly distinguishable in physique from the small slightly built Hindus. Amongst the Afghans in India, the tribal organisation which they brought with them from their native hills, still largely remained in force; by reason of this it happened that generally the more influential men's first or chief wife was an Afghan, thereby ensuring that a fair number of the Afghans settled in India were really of pure Afghan origin, but still the mass even of the so-called Afghans were rather Indian Muhammedans than Afghans so far indeed as race was concerned. From the Afghans of India, but of pure blood, a man of genius arose, who, as my readers will shortly see, turned the Chagatai Turks and their ruler out of India. If his successors had only been like unto him, probably the Chagatais would have returned but many years after, when the inevitable decay which attacks all Eastern Kingdoms had laid its hands on the Afghan Kingdom; but as it was Sher Shah had no genius as his successor, the Chagatai was never thoroughly expelled and within twenty years of what seemed his final expulsion, he again ruled over the kingdom of Delhi. And so it came about that a foreign race, whose resources were in reality, though not in miles as far distant from their Indian capital, as were two centuries later the resources of the white races became for a century and a half the ruler of Hindustan. The great Akbar, the greatest of the race, by his policy of India for the Indians, a policy which according to one's point of view will be an object of admiration or the reverse, deliberately stopped these resources at their root. This was the beginning; with his successors the dead rot and corruption, which normally grasp an Eastern rule, when vivifying external sources of life are stopped, seized the Kingdom, and by the end of the seventeenth century the vigorous Empire of Baber and Akbar had plainly marked on it signs of dissolution as an Empire (though not as an organism). But this was, at the time of which I write, all in the distant future; the Chagatai Turk, virile, still redolent of the mountain and the steppes, ruled at Delhi, and whatever his faults were, brutality, sensuality, and the like, he was still every inch a man.

---

CHAPTER X

BABER left four sons, Humayun, Kamran, Hindal and Askari. They were all called Mirza, which indeed was a general name given to all the descendants of the great Taimur. I have already related how Humayun had been very ill at Delhi and how Baber believed that he had carried away his illness and taken it himself. But although Baber's favourite and eldest son, he was by no means certain of succeeding to the Imperial throne. Muhammedanism does not recognise the law of primogeniture in the strict sense in which European races do. The fittest rather than the eldest son with them is the successor to his father's powers. In many cases the son is left aside altogether as amongst the primitive German races and the ablest and most respected of the relations succeeds. The same laxity prevailed amongst the Mongols before they became Mussulmans, and their change of religion naturally brought about no change. So my reader will see that the last of the great Moghuls, Aurangzeb, could not have succeeded if primogeniture had been the rule of succession at Delhi. An intrigue was set on foot before Baber's death to set aside his sons altogether and to place on the throne Mehdi Khawaja, his son-in-law, a young nobleman about the Court. In this intrigue Khawja Khalifa, the Prime Minister, was mixed up; but all chances of success were shattered by Mehdi Khawaja's arrogance and folly which disgusted all his partizans and ruined any hopes he might have had of becoming Padshah. In Nizam-uddin's Tabakat Akbari we read the following :

* 'It so happened,' writes he, 'that Mir Khalifa had gone to see Mehdi Khawaja, whom he found in his pavilion. Nobody was present but Khalifa, Mehdi Khawaja and my father, Muhammad Mokim. Khalifa had hardly sat down an instant, when Baber, who was at the point of death, sent for him. When he left the pavilion, Mehdi Khawaja accompanied him to the door to do him honour, and to take leave of him, and stood in the middle of the doorway; so that my father, who followed, but out of respect did not push by him, was immediately behind. The young man, who was rather flighty and hairbrained, forgetting that my father was present, as soon as Khalifa was fairly gone, stroking his beard, muttered to himself, 'Please God, I will soon flay off your hide, old boy,' and, turning round at the same instant, saw my father. He was quite confounded; but immediately seizing my father's ear, twisted it round, and said hurriedly, 'You Tajik, the red tongue often gives the green head to the winds.' My father, having taken his leave and left the tent, called upon Khalifa, and remonstrated with him on his line of conduct; telling him that, in violation of his allegiance, he was taking away the sovereignty from Muhammad Humayun, and his brothers, who were accomplished princes, to bestow it on the son of a stranger. And yet, how did this favoured man behave? He then repeated what had passed, just as it happened. Khalifa, on the spot, sent off an express to call Humayun; and, at the same time, despatched a body of yasawals or special messengers to Mehdi Khawaja to inform him that the Emperor's orders were, that he should instantly retire to his own house. The young man by this time had sat down to dinner, which was still before him. The yasawals communicated their orders, and forced him away to his house, reluctant as he was to go. Mir Khalifa then issued a proclamation, prohibiting all persons from resorting to Mehdi Khawaja's house, or waiting upon him ; while Mehdi Khawaja himself received orders forbidding him to appear at Court."

* Erskine. Vol. I. p. 515.

Consequently on Baber's death Humayun ascended the Imperial throne at Delhi without a voice being openly raised against him, though from the very first day of his reign rivals claiming parts of his father's kingdom sprung up, of whom some aspired to the Imperial throne of Delhi itself.

Humayun was only twenty-two years of age when he became Padshah. His nominal reign was for twenty-six years, but he actually only reigned in India for about ten from A.D. 1530 to A.D. 1540 when he was driven from his Indian Kingdom by the Afghan Sher Shah. He repossessed himself of a part of the kingdom only during the last few months of his life. His main characteristic may be summed up in the expressive Scottism "feckless." He seemed all his life constitutionally unable to think of the morrow. This want of foresight was probably considerably deepened by his attachment to opium. The eating of this drug was an Eastern habit long before the British conquest of India. The action of the English Government, indeed, as regards India itself, has been directed mainly towards regulating and restricting its use. There was no such restriction in Muhammedan India. Brave as all the earlier royal Moghuls were, not one of them carried perhaps his bravery to such a point of rashness as Humayun. As a General, he seems to have been useless ; but as a warrior, ready for any deed of daring-do, he was amongst the first. Witness his climb of the Chaupanir fortress where with a few followers he clambered up the almost inaccessible side of one of the strongest forts in India. He was credulous to a degree, always being deceived and never learning prudence thereby ; a lover of pomps and vain ceremonies — few Sovereigns in the East indeed are ever otherwise, but few have been known to be so fond of foolish ostentation as he. For instance he had halls dedicated to each of the seven heavenly bodies. One day of the week he held audience in each ; and he himself and his Courtiers dressed in clothes of a colour conforming to that of the walls of these halls, each being painted differently. Save for an excessive liking for Astrology, he does not seem to have been more superstitious than other rulers of his time, and we read but little of his visiting the shrines of Muhammedan dead Saints in the hope of obtaining blessings from such pilgrimages. In this respect he contrasts favourably with his son, the renowned and liberal Akbar. Beyond all things he was not cruel ; remembering he was a Moghul, and that the age was an age where Kings were one and all men of blood. In this respect his character deserves the highest praise.

Humayun's first act on his coming to the throne was to give Jagirs to his brothers. To Kamran he confirmed Kabul and Kandahar, which at the time of Baber's death were in the latter's possession : to Askari he gave Sambhal (Rohilkund), and to Hindal he gave Mewat (Ulwar). Kamran, who was the second brother, gave the most trouble, though the others were also only too often thorns in his flesh. The former's first act was to march into India, not nominally for the purpose of war, but with the intent to wait upon circumstances and to seize what he could. It was not long before he obtained possession of Lahore. Humayun, who had received from Baber in his death-bed the advice to live peacefully and in unity with his brothers, allowed Kamran to keep this important city though thereby he blocked himself completely from the West. But although Humayun for a time by this concession kept off his most formidable brother, he had other rivals to meet. Two great Court Nobles, both of them descended from Taimur, Muhammad Zuman Mirza and Muhammad Sultan Mirza, had both schemes on the throne. Both of them had adherents about the Court : both of them had to fly, both caused for many years much trouble and the careers of both of them only came to an end after Sher Shah had driven Humayun from India. Besides them Sultan Muhammad Lodi, a scion of the Afghan race that had ruled at Delhi, took advantage of Humayun's first absence from his Capital to capture Jaunpore. Humayun's troubles with him were, however, short. He marched against him, defeated him and drove him into Behar where he shortly afterwards died. The house of Lodi after his death ceased to give trouble. It was an Afghan of another family the Sur, Sher Shah who was destined to drive the Moghuls for the time out of India. His time was however not yet. At the time of which I am writing, i.e., the years immediately after the accession of Humayun, Sher Shah was still a comparatively unimportant personage. He held out, indeed, at Chunar against Humayun's troops for a time, but he submitted nominally at last, and as far as outward appearances went, was, during the first three or four years of Humayun's reign, only one of a number of great Afghan nobles. Humayun had to waste a great part of his strength in fruitless campaigning in Malwa and Gujarat before the time of the Afghan came.

I have in the Chapter of Baber mentioned that Gujarat and Malwa, two Muhammedan Kingdoms, lay to the South of Rajputana. The King of the former land Bahadur Shah had become, by the course of events, one of the most powerful rulers of India. Sometimes helped by the Rajputs, sometimes without external help, by force or by intrigue he had before Humayun's accession made himself gradually Lord of almost all Gujarat and Malwa. Muhammad Zaman Mirza, whom I have mentioned above, fled to Bahadur's Court, and the latter declining to surrender the former was the cause of war breaking out between the Malwa Ruler and Humayun. It began by Humayun's invasion of Malwa.* Bahadur Shah had hoped to prevent this or at least to force Humayun to retreat nearer to Delhi by inducing rebels against the Imperial throne to lead their troops to Biana and other places close to Agra; but these were brushed away and Humayun would have been able to have met Bahadur Shah at a very early stage of the campaign, had it not been for an appeal to his religious feelings. Bahadur Shah was besieging Chitor, the capital of the Sesodias, the most powerful of the Rajput tribes. They had lost greatly in power owing to their complete defeat at Fatehpur Sikri by Baber, and Chitor was now hard pressed. We are told that Bahadur Shah's Councillors had declared that as a believer Humayun could not attack Bahadur Shah while prosecuting a holy war; we are also told that Humayun, on hearing this, stated that the Ministers were quite right and that while the holy war continued he would maintain a position of neutrality. And so it came about that he took no offensive step against the Gujarat army till after the capture of Chitor. This place fell in March 1535 A.D. The ordinary scenes at the carrying by storm of a Rajput fortress then took place. Women were put to the sword or thrown into the pyre, and then the Rajputs rushed on their enemy determined to die and desirous only to slay whom they could before death. Such is the reason given by the Muhammedan Historians for Humayun's delay in attacking Bahadur Shah; but Todd, who uses as his authorities the Rajput annalists, tells us quite a different story. Chitor was simply lost by Humayun's usual habit of delay. No religious scruples according to these annalists stopped him; he indeed was bound to succour the fortress on account of his having been sent by the Queen of Mewar, who herself was burnt on the pyre on the last day of the siege, a bracelet, which in Indian History has ever been a call for succour, not to be neglected on the pain of being considered absolutely worthless. This Queen had sent the bracelet to Humayun before open hostilities had commenced between him and Bahadur Shah; though the war near Chitor between the Gujarat Prince and the Rajputs was going on,—while the former was engaged at the extreme Eastern end of his dominions conquering the North-West of Bengal. As to this Todd tells us “*the monarch of India was so pleased with this courteous delicacy in the customs of Rajasthan, on receiving the bracelet of the Princess Kurnavati, which invested him with the title of her brother, and uncle and protector to her infant Oody Sing, that he pledged himself to her service, "even if the demand were the castle of Rantanbhor. Humayun proved himself a true Knight, and even abandoned his conquests in Bengal when called on to redeem his pledge, and succour Chitor, and the widows and minor sons of Sanga Rana. Humayun had the highest proofs of the worth of those courting his protection; he was with his father Baber in all his wars in India, and at the battle of Biana his prowess was conspicuous, and is recorded by Baber's own pen. He amply fulfilled his pledge, expelled the foe from Chitor, took Mandoo by assault, and, as some revenge for her King's aiding the King of Gujarat, he sent for the Rana Bikermajit whom, following their own notions of investiture, he girt with a sword in the captured citadel of his foe." We must not accept the story as told by Todd in its entirety as far at least as Humayun's motives were concerned. Doubtless he felt flattered at the Hindu Queen's attention, but his wars against Bahadur Shah were occasioned as much by motives of self-defence and of conquest as by a desire to prove himself faithful to the Rajput bracelet.

---

* A.D. 1534.

* Todd, Rajasthan. Vol. I. pp. 263—264.

Shortly after the capture of Chitor, Bahadur Shah's forces came front to front with Humayun's forces near the town of Mandsur. Acting as it is said at the advice of Rumi Khan, the Commander of his Artillery, he avoided a battle; instead of which he constructed and fortified a camp, whereby he placed himself in a position in which he could not be successfully attacked. This policy proved his ruin, as has often been the case in the East. The camp was unassailable certainly, but the enemy scoured the country round, cut off supplies and acquired all the prestige which in the East falls to the offensive party. In the various skirmishes which took place between the two armies, the Imperial forces had generally the advantage; supplies ran short and the Gujarat army became reduced to the depth of wretchedness. Bahadur Shah at length, accompanied with but a few friends, fled. His flight was the signal for the total dispersal of his troops. Humayun's forces burst into the deserted camp and pillaged to their heart's content. Bahadur Shah did not slacken his flight until he reached Mandu the capital of Malwa. Rumi Khan joined Humayun—possibly to save himself from the wrath of Bahadur Shah. The latter proposed to Humayun that he would surrender to him Malwa; while negotiations were going on, a small Imperial force scaled Mandu and Bahadur Shah fled to Gujarat.*

After the rout of Mandasar the war entered into a new phase. A large part of Malwa is hilly—in this respect differing greatly from the Gujarat plain. Mandu itself is on a flat hill just north of the Vindhya range. Such flat hills, with steep ascents on more than one side are not uncommon in Central India, and have from time immemorial been chosen for fortresses. Granted a good water supply, there was no reason why they should not hold out indefinitely against a besieging force, not furnished with artillery. As from Central India one gets to Maharashtra, the mountainous part of Western India, which has as its backbone the Western Ghats, forts multiply themselves greatly; but the summits of the hills on which they are built are generally smaller, while to compensate for this the hills themselves are steeper and higher.

Humayun's victorious army did not stop at Mandu. It chased Bahadur Shah first to Champanir then to Cambay on the coast, from which place the King of Gujarat fled to Diu, in which was then a trading Portuguese factory. A large part of those of his troops, who had kept together, were in Champanir, and this place was forthwith besieged by the Delhi army, who blockaded it for over four months. At last it was taken by a night escalade. It was in this capture that Humayun showed the reckless daring to which I have already referred. The side scale had a precipitous face near the summit, 30 or 40 yards high up, which the assailants had to climb by stepping on hand spikes driven into the rock to serve as steps of a ladder. Humayun was the forty first to ascend. About three hundred in all got into the fort by this way before the morning dawned. The fort was taken and the garrison with the exception of the Governor, was put to the sword; one of the few instances in which Humayun's usual clemency forsook him. In fact Humayun seems at this time to have acted more cruelly than he ever did before or after. Some of the young men in his army, having deserted with the intention of establishing a kingdom for themselves, were taken and either executed or barbarously mutilated. The rest of the story of the Gujarat War, though told in great detail by Erskine in his invaluable History of Baber and Humayun, need not keep us long. Humayun after he had come into possession of the rich fertile lands of Gujarat including its capital Ahmadabad, as well as the hilly slopes of Malwa—lapsed into truly Oriental inactivity. His brother, Askari who was acting as one of his chief lieutenants became disaffected; revolt again broke out in the provinces near Agra; Bahadur Shah returned and drove the Delhi troops out of Gujarat. Owing to Askari's attitude, Humayun found his position in Malwa most difficult to maintain, and finally revolts near Agra and the success of Sher Shah, to whom we shall have now to turn, made Humayun abandon all his conquests in Gujarat and Malwa. Bahadur Shah did not, however, live to reign again for any time over Gujarat. Visiting the Portuguese Viceroy on board ship at Diu where, taking advantage of the recent troubles, the Portuguese had built a fort, though without any title of right, the latter tried to seize him. The story of what followed may best be told in Erskine's own words.* "The Sultan thrown off his guard, or perhaps suspecting no ill as intending none, laid ceremony aside, and towards the close of the day rowed off from the shore, with only a few attendants and went aboard the admiral's ship, to visit him, and to inquire after his health. No sooner, however, did he see the Viceroy, than he plainly perceived that his illness was a mere pretence, and felt vexed that he had gone. The Viceroy, on his part, had probably been taken unprepared by Bahadur Shah's sudden and unexpected appearance. During the conversation that ensued, a page came in and whispered something in his ear. In the state of mind in which the King then was, this little incident increased his uneasiness and excited his suspicion. He continued to sit, however, though the intercourse was forced and constrained; till the Viceroy, rising, requested to be excused for a few moments, as he wished to show his Majesty some presents that were intended for his acceptance, and left the cabin. This confirmed the suspicions of the King, who hurriedly intimating a desire that they might be sent after him, started up and hastened to his boat. He reached it and put off; when Emanuel de Souza, the Governor of Diu Castle coming up in his barge, invited him to visit the new fortifications. Rumi Khan Sefer, who was in the boat with the King, advised him to decline the invitation, as treachery was probably intended; but the King desired de Souza to come into the boat. De Souza, in attempting to step from his own barge into the King's, fell into the sea, but was taken up by Bahadur's attendants. This occasioned considerable bustle, and confusion; the cause was unknown, but the act of dragging de Souza into the boat, was observed by the Portuguese in the numerous vessels that lay on every side. Hastily concluding that an attempt was made upon their countrymen's life, in their eagerness to succour him, they closed round the King's boat, into which some of them leaped. The instant consequence was uproar and menace; blows speedily succeeded. Bahadur, totally unprepared for such an occurrence, and now confirmed in his suspicions of treachery, threw himself into the sea, and was followed by Rumi Khan. After swimming for some time towards the shore, as he approached a Portuguese vessel, one of the officers held out an oar to assist him in getting in; when a soldier who stood by, struck him on the face with a halbert, and his example was imitated by others of his comrades, who repeated their blows, till Bahadur sank dead in the water. Rumi Khan was saved by a Portuguese to whom, on some former occasion, he had shown kindness. De Souza the Governor, was struck and fell overboard, during the scuffle in the King's boat. Neither his body nor that of the King could be found." From that day Diu has remained a Portuguese possession.

* A. D. 1535.

* Erskine, Vol. II, pp. 92—93.

CHAPTER XI.

SHER SHAH AND HIS SUCCESSORS.

SHER SHAH'S grandfather, Ibrahim, was an Afghan of the Sur Clan. Bahlol Lodi, the first of the Lodi Emperors of Delhi, was specially partial to Afghans of the Roh Country owing to their having helped him when in great need during his wars with the King of Jaunpur. It was from this Roh* country that Ibrahim came. His native place known as Sharhgari in the Afghan and Rohri in the Multani tongue, is situated in the Sulaiman range which divides the North-West of India from Afghanistan. Sher Shah was of pure Afghan descent, his father Hasan being the offspring of Ibrahim and an Afghan Mother, and he being likewise the son of Hasan by an Afghan Mother. This fact and the short residence of his ancestors in India will explain much of his vigour and character. He was born in the lifetime of Bahlol Lodi, and thus must have been near his fiftieth year before he disputed with Humayun for Empire. His original name was Farid, the name of Sher Shah having been given him by Sultan Muhammad, a temporary King of Behar, at the end of Baber's reign on account of his killing a tiger with his sabre in the royal presence. Regarding his birth and early days, Erskine tells us: "† Omens seldom fail to attend the birth of every eminent man, and they were not wanting to Farid's. His mother, when with child of him, dreamed that the moon, in its full brightness descending from heaven, entered her womb. Waking her husband, she communicated to him her dream; upon which he struck her several blows. Surprised, she angrily asked him what he meant; and was told, that the sages of former times had advised that one who had a fortunate dream ought not, by dreaming again the same night to run the risk of counter-acting its happy influence; and that his blows were intended to prevent her again falling asleep." In like manner we are told of * Note.—From Roh comes the clan name Rohilla. Rohilkund is so called from the large number of Rohillas who had settled there early in the eighteenth century and established themselves in that Country as a semi-independent Power.

---

† Erskine, Vol. II. pp. 112-113

Farid, that when he was about four years old, as he was one day childishly whining to his father to give him a dirhem, a wise and holy derwish who was near, exclaimed aloud, "Great God, the Emperor of Hindustan is crying for a dirhem." This expression filled his father with delight, as confirming his wife's dream, and inspired him with high hopes of his son's future eminence; hopes which the boy's opening talents seemed early to justify."

His father when old became infatuated with a concubine of Hindu extraction, who had borne three sons to him; and the consequence was that at her instigation he became greatly displeased with Farid. Consequently abandoning his home, his father had two Perganahs in Behar, South of the Ganges, Farid went to Jaunpur, where he employed himself in the study of Arabic. In this he obtained some proficiency, and when he became Emperor of Delhi he was very favourably inclined towards learned men. Some time after Hasan was persuaded by his kindred to attend the Jaunpur Court and to commit the administration of the two Perganahs into the hands of Farid. The grant of a Perganah (district) from a Muhammedan king was the conferring on the recipient most of the rights of royalty. A certain amount of revenue had generally to be paid to the king, though this was sometimes remitted; but the governing of the district, the civil and criminal administration and the method of collecting the revenue was left almost entirely to the grantee. It was while administering these two Perganahs in his early days that Sher Shah commenced using these administrative methods, as far as land revenue is concerned, which have continued with only modifications throughout India unto the present day. Many of his relations held Jagirs—grants of lands within these Perganahs. He reserved to himself from the outset the right to resume these. He then settled the method of appraising and paying the land revenue. This in India has from time immemorial been the main source of the income of Government, and a good or bad system and still more the good or bad administration of any system are more effectual in promoting the good or the ill of the people than anything else connected with the Government. The Muhammedan law, as laid down in the books of their classical law authorities, recognises no one save the cultivator himself. No middleman is known to it. Such a system in its simplicity can of course never be practicable in a state of any extent. There must be Collectors and these Collectors must be paid for their trouble, the ordinary method of payment being a share of the collections. Under Hindu law the same theory of the cultivator paying to the Ruler prevailed as in Muhammedanism, but was much more complicated owing to the various vested interests in the land. Thus for instance in any village a certain part of the community was considered as more or less the landlord of the village, and any cultivators not belonging to this community paid to them and not to the King. Middlemen of every sort also sprung up, and so the system though appearing to be exceedingly simple was really very complex, often so to a degree.

Besides the payment of officials by a grant of Government Revenue, this revenue was largely alienated also to individuals as a reward for services. The recipient had often to pay a part of his collections to Government. This made the system still more intricate. Add to this that in India the principle of hereditary occupation creeps into everything from landholding to scavengering, and one finds evolved out of the systems of Land Revenue all the elements of a landlord system, not such, indeed, a system as prevails in the West, but still one permitting a non-cultivating class to have rights in the soil. Such a thing in Mediæval India was indeed inevitable. Landlords in India have ever been officials too. In British India traces of this connection exist in Regulations mostly disused, directing landlords to look after the peace of their estates, but as a general rule the result of English rule has been that the landlord has ceased to be an official and has become a pure rent charger; being rarely a capitalist, a greater part of whose rent is a return for money invested. In Great Britain, on the other hand a large part of rent is a return for money spent on the improvement of the landlord's property, but ordinarily in India, it is nothing of the sort; the Indian landlord toils not nor does he spin; to his income the expression the 'unearned increment' is eminently applicable; his old occupation is gone, and he has become, only too commonly, simply the partaker of a portion of the profit arising from the cultivator's labour.

Sher Shah started off in his reforms in the two Perganahs of his father by going back to the old Muhammedan rule and getting rid of the middleman. In the Tarikh-i-Sher Shahi we read " *When he had finished exhorting the soldiery, he turned to the peasantry and said: 'This day I give you your choice as to your mode of payment. Do whatever is most advantageous to your own interests in every possible way.'

"Some of the headmen asked for written agreements for a fixed money rent; others preferred payment in kind (Kismat-i-ghalla). Accordingly he gave leases and took agreements, and fixed the payments for measuring the fields (jaribana) and the fees for the tax collectors and measurers (muhassilana); and he said to the Chaudharis and headmen: "I know well that the cultivation depends on the humble peasants, for if they be ill off they will produce nothing, but if prosperous they will produce much. I know the oppressions and exactions of which we have been guilty towards the cultivators; and for this reason I have fixed the payments for measurements, and the tax-gatherers' fees, that if you exact from the cultivators more on this account than is fixed, it may not be credited to you in making up your accounts. Be it known to you, that I will take the accounts of the fees in my own presence. Whatever dues are rightly taken I will sanction, and compel the cultivators to pay them; and I will also collect the Government dues for the autumn harvest in the autumn, and for the spring harvest in the spring; for balances of Government dues are the ruin of a pergunah, and the cause of quarrels between the cultivators and the Government officers. It is right for a ruler to show leniency to the cultivators at the period of measurement, and to have a regard to the actual produce; but when the time of payment comes he should show no leniency, but collect the revenue with all strictness. If he perceives the cultivators are evading payment, he should so chastise them as to be an example to others not to act in the same way." He then said to the peasantry :—" Whatever matter you have to represent, bring it always yourselves to me. I will suffer no one to oppress you."

* Elliott, Vol. IV, pp. 313—314

The extract is long, but it deserves reproducing. It embodies in it the rules which have governed the wisest Indian administrators. Too often Indian land revenue collections have been pure robbery and tyranny, the Collector carrying off every thing he can ; only a part of which, generally only a small part, reaching the treasury ; in other cases a high assessment has acted as injuriously as open robbery could do. A lenient assessment and a strict collection of the revenue so assessed has been the Motto of the best, both of Muhammedan and English officials. This is not the place to go into the comparative merits of a payment by revenue in kind or by cash, but I might point out here that before the advent of the British Government a permanent settlement was never contemplated by any ruler, Hindu or Muhammedan. A uniform settlement over a series of years fixed on averages taken from certain data was adopted by Akbar, but this was only to save incessant trouble and oppression of the ryots by yearly enquiries ; but the fundamental idea underlying the assessment of land revenue, has always been that a fraction of the yearly crop belongs to the crown.

Farid was inexorable in putting down disorder. Once he learnt that any persons within his pergunahs were behaving badly by oppressing the ryots or by theft or murder, no pardon remained for such. These he killed without accepting any ransom ; their women and children were sold as slaves. Such a rule, stern but just, soon had its effects. The pergunahs became prosperous, and Farid's fame as an administrator spread throughout the Eastern Districts. But this happy state of things did not last long. His father returned from the Court at Jaunpur and with him came his Hindu concubine and her sons. The woman gave Hasan no rest until he appointed two of these in Farid's place. So the latter left Behar and went to Agra to push his fortunes there. Becoming a dependent of Doulat Khan Lodi, the latter recommended him to Ibrahim Shah, the then King of Delhi, and besought the latter to invest him with the two Behar pergunahs which were then nominally the property of his father. Farid told his story how his father, infatuated with a slave girl, was ruining the lands. But Ibrahim for reply only said,—“He is a bad man who complains against and accuses his own father.” And so Farid had to wait at Agra till his father's death. Then he obtained investiture from Ibrahim and promptly left the Capital for the pergunahs. The times were troublous, and only a strong hand and a clear head could safely steer through them. Farid had both. To the Governor of the pergunah of Chaundh, who tried to force him to share the pergunahs with his half brothers and who in a letter reminded him that the laws and customs of the Afghans allowed no rule of primogeniture, he replied :

*“ Do you, Shadi Khan, tell the Khan from me, that this is not the Roh Country that I should share equally with my half brothers. The country of India is completely at the disposal of the King, nor has anyone else any share in it, nor is there any regard to elder or younger, or to kindred. Sikandar Lodi thus decided : ‘ If any noble dies, whatever money or other effects he may leave should be divided among his heirs according to the laws of inheritance ; but his office and his jagirs and his military retinue let him confer on whichever of the sons he thinks most able ; and in these no one else has a right to share, nor is any remedy open to them.’ Whatever goods and money my father left, Sulaiman with my brothers appropriated before he sought refuge with you. Hitherto, out of regard for my relationship to you, I have said nothing ; but whenever he may quit you, I shall reclaim my share of my patrimonial inheritance from him. The Jagir and office were conferred on me by Sultan Ibrahim ; in them no one else has any share. But I said to my brothers, The Jagirs which you enjoyed in my father's lifetime I will continue, nay increase to you; but no one can participate in my office.' It does not become you to say, 'Give up Tanda and Mahu to Sulaiman,' I will not willingly yield them. If you take them by force, and give them to him, it is in your power to do so. I have not another word to say."

* Elliot, Vol. IV, p. 327.

By stratagems and by fighting he not only maintained his hold on the two pergunahs of his father, but also drove the Governor of Chaundh out of the pergunahs under his charge. He made peace, however, with this noble and restored to him the pergunahs he had taken, the result being that nothing further was heard of the pretensions of his half-brothers.

After he had settled matters thus on his own estate he went to Agra and served under Baber at Chanderi and elsewhere. Having studied the latter's military methods and the Moghul administration generally, he often used to say: "If luck aids me and fortune stands my friend I shall easily oust the Moghuls from Hindustan." At the time naturally all thought this but vain boasting. Abbas Khan, the author of the Tarikh-i-Sher Shahi, tells us as to this the following story which he says he heard from his uncle: "*I was at the battle of Chanderi, with the force of the victorious Emperor Baber, the second Faridun, and in attendance on the Khan Khanan Yusuf-Khail, who brought the Emperor Baber from Kabul, and Sheikh Ibrahim Sarwani said to me, 'Come to Sher Khan's quarters, and hear his impossible boastings, which all men are laughing at.' We accordingly rode over to Sher Khan's quarters. In the course of conversation, Sheikh Ibrahim said: 'It is impossible that the empire should again fall into the hands of the Afghans, and the Moghuls be expelled from the country.' Sher Khan replied:— 'Sheikh Muhammad, be you witness now between Sheikh Ibrahim and myself, that if luck and fortune favour me, I will very shortly expel the Moghuls from Hind, for the Moghuls are not superior to the Afghans in battle or single combat; but the Afghans have let the Empire of Hind slip from their hands, on account of their internal dissensions. Since I have been amongst the Moghuls, and know their conduct in action, I see that they have no order or discipline, and that their kings, from pride of birth and station, do not personally superintend the Government, but leave all the affairs and business of the State to their nobles and ministers, in whose sayings and doings they put perfect confidence. These grandees act on corrupt motives in every case, whether it be that of a soldier's or a cultivator's, or a rebellious zamindar's. Whoever has money, whether loyal or disloyal, can get his business settled as he likes by paying for it; but if a man has no money, although he may have displayed his loyalty on a hundred occasions, or be a veteran soldier, he will never gain his end. From this lust of gold they make no distinction between friend and foe, and if fortune extends a hand to me, the Sheikh shall soon see and hear how I will bring the Afghans under my control, and never permit them again to become divided."

* Elliot, Vol. IV. pp. 330—331.

Such conversation naturally came to Baber's ears. On becoming personally acquainted with Sher Shah, Baber's respect for his ability and distrust of his aims increased, and he would have had arrested, had it not been for his speedy flight. Back in Behar he allied himself with his old enemy the Governor of Chaundh, and after the latter's death he became the virtual Governor in his place.

Jalal Khan Lohani at this time, i.e., at the end of Baber's reign, held supreme rule over most of Behar, his head-quarters being at Patna. Intermittent war was carried on between him and the King of Bengal. He had thus two enemies, the Moghuls pressing him from the North and West and the Bengal King from the South and East. With Sher Shah's help, he defeated the latter; and Sher Shah after this victory kept all the spoil for himself. Such a course of conduct offended the Lohanis, Jalal's Kinsmen, and plots were formed to treacherously slay Sher Shah. From all these he escaped; eventually Jalal Khan fled to Bengal, and Sher Shah after considerable fighting became ruler of Behar. To effect this he had to gain over the local Afghans to his side and this he did both by handsomely rewarding them with Jagirs and cash, and also by looking after them on the field of battle and not exposing them unnecessarily.

Chunar fell into his hands by a marriage with Lad Malika, the concubine of Taj Khan, who had held it for the Lodi Kings and who had been slain by one of his legitimate sons. There was after this murder a contest between the sons and the concubine, and the latter, who had the treasure of her Master, surrendered both it and the fort of Chunar to Sherkhan on his promising to marry her which promise he kept. Chunar in olden days was a fort of great strength. Its sides are steep and it is difficult to escalate. It overlooks the Ganges, and is indeed the only strong place of arms for three hundred miles along the Ganges, from Allahabad to Monghyr. With it in his occupation Sher Shah had no difficulty in subjugating the country around. But for a while his course was stopped by Muhammad Shah Lodi, a relation of Ibrahim Lodi, the Delhi King slain at Paniput, entering Behar. Sher Shah was forced to feign obedience to him as Emperor. But this state of things did not last long, for in a battle between Muhammed Shah and Humayun, Sher Shah deserted and his defection led largely to the defeat of the former. After this Chunar was besieged by Humayun's lieutenants, but as I have already related, Sher Shah by feigned obedience managed to keep the fort in his own possession. And so when Humayun marched away to his wars in Malwa and Gujarat, Sher Shah retained Chunar as an outlying fortress against the Moghuls. He also, the Lodi family having by this time ceased to have any influence, became ruler of Behar, and the most prominent Afghan in Eastern India. Behar being his, he proceeded to attack Bengal; at the same time perceiving that Chunar was too exposed and isolated to be his stand by in time of need, he began to look for a more secure fortress, and this he found in Rohtas. This fortress stands on the Sone some distance above its junction with the Ganges. On the river side it stands several hundred feet above the river, the descent being almost a sheer precipice. On the other side it is also inaccessible, the plateau on the top is several miles in area and has a plentiful water-supply; crops to support a considerable garrison, can easily be grown within, and so in the olden days it was an ideal place of refuge. Standing where it does its garrison is on the flank of any force proceeding down the Ganges on its southern side, and an invasion of Bengal with it and the neighbouring fort Shergarh, which was also held by Sher Shah unsubdued, is highly dangerous and imprudent as Humayun found afterwards to his cost. The fort had for hundreds of years been in possession of a race of Hindu robber Rajas—Sher Shah got possession of it by stratagem. Thus Erskine tells the story :—

*“ With caution and secrecy he proposed to the Raja, Hari Kishen Birkis, to be allowed, in this pressing exigency, to send his harem and family, with his treasure and a few attendants, into the fort, as a place in which they might be safe from all the accidents of war. This was at first refused. But Sher Khan employed an able Agent, who gained the Raja’s favourite wife and his Ministers by rich presents, and who represented to the Raja, that, in the doubtful enterprises in which Sher Khan was engaged, it would be an unspeakable relief to his mind to know, that, even should he be deprived of life, his harem and his honour would be safe; and that his wealth, such as it was, the treasures and the plunder of Bengal, instead of falling into the hands of his inveterate enemies, would enrich a friend who had ever been faithful to him. And the Raja, thus strongly urged, whatever were his motives, whether friendship or avarice, was finally persuaded to comply with Sher Khan’s request.

The plan said to have been adopted by him was not altogether novel, and was founded on the severe and jealous delicacy with which in the East women of rank are treated. A thousand doolies, or covered litters, were provided, in each of which was placed a chosen Afghan warrior, in armour, and sent up to the fort. In some of the first, ladies were seated, to cover the deceit; in others were arms. When the persons in charge of the gates, stopped the doolies, at the head of the procession; and began examining them, Sher Khan despatched a messenger to the Raja, to remonstrate with him on the unspeakable disgrace he would incur, were his females exposed to view; and the Raja sent orders to let them pass without examination. As soon as all the doolies were within the fort, the armed men issued from them; the bearers and attendants supplied themselves with arms from the doolies; one party advanced to seize the palace, and another took possession of the gates, and admitted Ser Khan and his troops. Hari Kishen effected his escape by a private passage.

* Erskine, Vol. II, pp. 147—148.

Akbar Khan declares the story to be an invention and tells how a Brahmin friend of Sher Khan persuaded the Raja to lend the fort to Sher Shah, partly by pointing out to him the advantages of so doing and partly by threatening to poison himself if his request was refused. I prefer the story of the doolies.

In telling the story of the capture of Rohtas, I have anticipated for Rohtas was not actually seized by Sher Shah till Chunar had been captured by Humayun. In my last Chapter I related how the Emperor had been forced to leave Gujarat and Malwa by the bad news he had received from Agra and particularly by what he had learnt of Sher Shah's successful activity. After putting down disaffection at Agra, Humayun leisurely marched down the right bank of the Ganges and after a six months' siege, captured Chunar. It was after this capture that Sher Shah got possession of Rohtas. While Humayun was spending his time in thus besieging Chunar, Sher Shah had been conquering Bengal. The Muhammedan kingdom which bore this name had as its natural boundary the hills which, from Raj Mahal running Westward, are, the Eastern extremity of the range stretching across Central India, commonly known as the Vindhya. The only practicable road for an army of invaders to penetrate into this country, provided it does not come by river, is by the narrow pass between Raj Mahal and the Ganges. This pass is easily defended being narrow and steep. In former times the Aryan invaders whose descendants are the present high class Bengalees, may have passed over the hill sides; light cavalry bands of Mahratta robbers have found their way somehow across; but a Moghul army, such, as Moghul armies in India have been, with all their tents and paraphernalia and with the harems of the Emperor and the chief officers frequently accompanying them, could only enter Bengal by Raj Mahal. This Sher Shah full well knew; and so while invading Bengal, he fortified the pass, so that the Moghuls might not follow him. Sher Shah did not actually command the invading army. This he left to an officer of his, Khawas Khan, who was afterwards joined by Jalal Khan, one of his sons. The affairs of Bengal were in confusion; after the death of its king Nasrat Khan, there were rivals to the throne, and so no efficient resistance was made against the invaders. Gour, the Afghan capital of Bengal, whose ruins even now though covered by jungle, attest former greatness, was besieged and after a vigorous attack taken. Sher Shah at this time tried to make terms with Humayun. He offered, in case he was left Bengal, to abandon Behar and to send all the ensigns of royalty to Humayun and to pay tribute. But he was outbid by one of the Afghan claimants to the Bengal throne. Probably Humayun or his chief advisers—one is never sure when speaking of Humayun himself—had found out by this time the worthlessness of Sher Shah's promises. His historian Abbas Khan has, however, a long account of what Sher Shah said when he heard his offer had been refused. We read: * "When Sher Khan heard this intelligence, he entirely gave up all trust in the promises and faith of Humayun, and said to the envoy: 'I have observed all loyalty to the Emperor, and have committed no offence against him, and have not encroached upon his boundaries. When I got Behar from the Lohanis, and the King of Bengal formed a design to seize that country, I besought him most submissively to leave me as I was, and not to attempt to deprive me of Behar. By reason of his large army and forces he would not attend to me, and since he thus oppressed me, the Almighty gave me the victory; and as he coveted the Kingdom of Behar, God wrested away from him also the Kingdom of Bengal. The Emperor has only considered the word of the ruler of Bengal, and has overlooked the service I have rendered, and all the force of Afghans which I have assembled for his service, and has marched against Bengal. When the Emperor beseiged Chunar, the Afghans urged me to oppose him, but I restrained them from declaring war, and said, 'The Emperor is powerful; you should not fight with him for the sake of a fort, for he is my lord and patron, and when he perceives that, in spite of my powerful forces, I pay respect to him, he will understand that I am his loyal servant, and will give me a kingdom to maintain this large army.' 'The Emperor desired the kingdom of Behar, and I was willing to surrender it. But it is not the right way to govern a Kingdom to separate so large a force from his service, and in order to please their enemies, to ruin and slay the Afghans. But since the Emperor takes no heed of all this good service, and has violated his promise, I have now no hope or means of restraining the Afghans from opposing him. You will hear what deeds the Afghans will do, and the march to Bengal will end in repentance and regret, for now the Afghans are united, and have laid aside their mutual quarrels and envyings. The country which the Moghuls have taken from the Afghans they got through internal dissensions among the latter.' "

---

* Elliott, Vol. IV, pp. 363, 364.

Such reflections sound true; but knowing as we do Sher Shah's character and how in respect of keeping promises he was a typical Afghan,—Afghans are known even in India for their faithlessness -- we can only smile at his indignation at Humayun's alleged breach of faith.

Down by the side of the river the Moghul troops came. Sher Shah had by this time his treasure in Rohtas, he himself with a body of light troops was in the hilly country between that fort and the Ganges where it enters Bengal, and Jalal Khan, who had with him a part of the troops that had conquered Gour, was at the Raj Mahal or Garhi pass which he had fortified. No serious opposition was made to the invading host which swept through the Behar plain. Its first check was at Raj Mahal. There Jalal Khan kept it at bay, as long as he safely could, without exposing the troops with him to capture or slaughter; and then in through the pass flowed the invaders into Bengal. Gour already taken by the Afghans, was now occupied by the Moghuls.

This was in the height of the rains. A part of the Imperial army returned to Agra; the rest remained in Gour for three months. With these stayed the Emperor. During these months, decisive of his future, no one was allowed an audience with him. Why, we are not told; probably opium, his harem and the indolence which so often seized an Oriental (or for that matter an Occidental too), in a country "where it always seemeth afternoon" such as Bengal is in the rains, were the causes.

Anyhow though he was idle Sher Shah was not. A modern visitor to India must vanish from his thoughts, in imagining the plains of India as they were in Humayun's time, the present wide-spreading system of roads inaugurated by the British Government, for roads in Behar and Bengal were then non-existent. Sher Shah did build a high road in his later career through a part of Behar, but its time had not yet come. During the rainy season in the East of India, large parts of the country became enormous sheets of water with here and there villages and gardens standing like islands out of them. Means of communication away from the rivers there are none, save by carriage on cattle's or men's backs. Accordingly the state of the army at Gour soon became serious. Supplies became scanty; disease set in; news from the Upper Country did not come, all messages being cut off through the vigilance of Sher Shah's men, and when it did come it was of the most unpleasant nature. The Emperor's brother Mirza Hindal whom he had left behind had rebelled and declared himself Emperor at Agra; Sher Shah had beseiged and taken Benares, was blockading Chunar and had threatened Jaunpur. In this advance on Jaunpur Sher Shah won his first victory in fair fight against the Moghuls, a force of whom were met by a force of Afghans, superior in number and routed. "A cock once well beaten," said Sher Shah, "does not again easily come to the scratch." At last Humayun determined to return. Leaving Gour in charge of a Moghul chief with a small body of troops, he made his way with much difficulty to a point opposite Monghyr, having had to cross various rivers on his way. These he passed over exposing himself thereby to being constantly worried by Sher Shah's men, who appeared in force no where, but ever hung on his retreat. By continuing his course on the North and Eastern side he would have saved himself from this, for Sher Shah's men did not even then venture to advance far from the hills. Thus matters progressed, until Humayun halted on the bank of the Karunnassa river near the village of Chausa. Before leaving Bengal, he had heard that Sheik Bahlol, a man of great learning and piety, whom he had sent to Hindal to try and persuade the latter to abandon his rebellious attitude, had been put to death by his brother. A story told of the Emperor's brother Askari during the retreat from Gour shows how absolutely an army of mercenaries Humayun's soldiers had become. Askari was with the army on its retreat, his troops were the most efficient in the army; so Humayun promised him any reward he might demand if he extricated the army from its dangerous position. He thereupon replied that he would in such a case ask for a round sum of money, a supply of the most costly manufactures of Bengal, some handsome slaves and a few eunuchs. The officers on being asked, wanted higher ranks for themselves and higher pay both for themselves and for the soldiers.

Hindal's reign at Agra was but short. Erskine tells us that the most earnest remonstrances against his conduct, which had culminated in the execution of Sheikh Bahlol, came from the ladies of his father's harem.

*“ When Hindal went to the palace of his mother Dildar Aghachah, he found her attired in deep mourning. On his reproaching her for assuming the garb of sorrow at a moment when accession to the throne called only for joy and festivity, that lady, whose affections made her far-sighted, with tears assured her son, that, far from participating in his delight, she saw, in all that was passing around her, matter only of profound regret and condolence; that she seemed already mourning over his bier, that, young and inexperienced as he was, he had given himself up to the guidance of evil counsellors who had engaged him in a course that could lead only to ruin. ‘And,’ continued she, 'to your other guilt you have added the stain of innocent blood. You have murdered the holy Shaikh. Away; and do not defile my palace with your presence.' The prince used every means he could devise to soothe her resentment and sorrow, and insisted on carrying her along with him in his march to Delhi."

* Erskine, Vol. II, p. 164.

To this place he marched, only to find it strongly held for Humayun. His brother Kamran was called in from Lahore to help the defenders of the city, and on his approach Hindal retired and being pursued found himself forced to submit. Kamran recognizing his brother Humayun as Emperor, marched to Agra, and there began to levy troops in order to send them to his brother on the banks of the Karunnassa river. Humayun indeed badly wanted assistance. But after a time Kamran stopped all preparations under the short-sighted idea that his own interests would be bettered by the overthrow of Humayun—a very short-sighted view as the future showed, for Sher Shah was not merely a foe of Humayun, he was a foe to the whole Moghul race. In the meantime (A.D. 1539) Sher Shah had ventured to bring his army face to face with Humayun. Both sides fortified themselves; but Sher Shah's troops were most of them in their own country and had by long experience learnt how to forage for themselves. The Moghuls, on the other hand, were mainly foreigners and were poor hands at bringing in supplies. The distress in Humayun's camp became acute, and his forces became much in the same position as Bahadur Shah's at Mandsur. The river Karunnassa is one of ill omen to Hindus, who cross the Ganges both below and above in order to avoid crossing it and the Moghuls, though not Hindus, were much addicted to superstition. A superstition too of this kind was just the sort to cling to them in their state of dejection. In the meantime Sher Shah was at his old methods. A treaty was proposed and negotiated; an armistice was seemingly entered into, and it appeared as if the two contending parties were really to make peace. A Shaikh, famous on account of his piety was sent to Sher Shah's camp to settle the final terms. What followed I give in Abbas Khan's own words.

*“ Sheikh Khalil, in the presence of the Emperor’s men who had accompanied him, debated earnestly and long with Sher Shah and strongly advised the proposed peace; and during the consultation the following words fell from Sheikh Khalil. ‘If you do not agree with peace, away with you; declare war, and fight.’ Sher Khan said, ‘What you say is a good omen for me; please God, I will fight.’ After the consultation Sher Khan gave to Sheikh Khalil money and rich clothes and manufactures of Malda and of Bengal in enormous quantities, and captivated his heart by these presents and favours. Sher Khan then sent for Sheikh Khalil in private, and speaking of the reverence the Afghans entertained for the holy Sheikh Farid Shakar-ganj, and of their mutual fatherland and making him promises to his heart’s content, said: ‘I wish you to give me advice regarding peace or war with the Emperor Humayun,’ for the learned have said, ‘it behoves one to take counsel with the wise, with the intelligent, and with far-seeing holy men. Now, in you all these qualifications are united. Tell me, therefore, without diminution or reserve, what your mind, clear as the sun, thinks concerning my well-being. Is peace or war with the Emperor most to my advantage?’ ‘After much hesitation, Sheikh Khalil said: By asking my advice, you have in two ways placed me in a great difficulty: first since I have come to you as an envoy from the Emperor, it is not right that I should say anything except to his advantage; and, secondly, you have asked advice from me, and those of old have said, ‘if even your enemy asks your advice, speak the truth.’ If I give advice contrary to my own opinion I shall act dishonestly. The Afghans for generations past have held my ancestors in reverence; and it appears from the miraculous precepts of the holy prophet Muhammad (may God’s mercy rest on him), that it behoves him who gives advice to do so in good faith. I am compelled, therefore to speak the truth. War with the Emperor Humayun is more for your advantage than peace for this reason that, in his army the most complete disorder exists, he has no horses or cattle and his own brothers are in rebellion against him. He only makes peace with you now from necessity and will not eventually abide by the treaty. Look on this opportunity as so much gain, and do not let it out of your grasp, for you will never again have such another." Sher Khan was wavering in his decision as to peace or war; but as Sheikh Khalil advised against the peace, he abandoned all idea of it, and determined on war. He had before sent for Khawas Khan, and when he arrived he ordered the whole of his troops to arms as if Maharta was approaching to attack them. When he had gone four kos out of his encampment he returned, saying the spies had reported that Maharta was yet distant.

* Elliott, Vol. IV, pp. 371—374.

The next day he again arrayed his army and moved out, and when he had gone several kos, returned, and said that Maharta was not coming that day. A little before midnight he assembled all his chiefs and said, "I have promised peace to the Emperor Humayun; but I have considered that all the good service I have rendered has produced no good fruit; and after all my loyalty to him in producing the defeat of Sultan Mahmud, he demanded from me the fort of Chunar. When I refused to yield it, he sent a force to take it; and when that failed, he came himself to seize the fort, by force, but abandoned his intention when he heard that Mirza Muhammad Zaman had escaped from prison, and had raised a sedition in the country. Moreover, Sultan Bahadur, King of Gujarat, was coming to invade the country of Delhi, and so he was compelled to return. I sent my son Kutb Khan with him throughout the Gujarat campaign. Though I could have taken possession of the country of Jaunpur, etc., yet I did not commit any act of hostility, for the Emperor is mighty; and though I had the power I would not do any disloyal and evil act, that the Emperor might perceive I was his faithful servant, and desist from seeking. When he returned from Gujarat, he got his army in readiness and without regarding my loyalty, did his best to expel me; but as my fortune was great, he did not achieve his desire. I made every submission, but it was all profitless. When, in violation of his promises, he attacked Bengal, I lost all hopes in his goodness, and apprehending evil from him, was compelled to declare hostilities against him, and I expelled his governors and spoiled his country as far as Sumbhul,' and have not left a single Moghul in those parts. Now, with what hope can I conclude this peace with him? He makes peace and manifests a friendly disposition towards me, because his army is in want of horses and cattle and of every equipment, and because his brothers have rebelled against him. He is but playing with me, and eventually will not abide by this peace; but having appeased the rebellion of his brothers on his arrival at Agra, and refurnished his army, he will not fail to uproot and destroy me. I have often experienced that Afghans are braver in battles than the Moghuls, who only got the country from the dissensions of the Afghans. If my brothers advise so, I will break off the peace, and will try my fortune." "They all replied: 'By your blessing, dissension has been banished from among the Afghan nation, and we all have been cherished by you; we will not fail in devotion and gallantry to our utmost capability. Your purpose of breaking off the treaty is most wise.' Sher Khan said, "I break off the treaty. I have put my trust in the Protector, and will fight the Emperor Humayun as Mian Nizami has observed."

The extract is long, but I cannot well cut it down, casting the light that it does on the character not only of Sher Shah, but of the innermost thoughts of the people of the time. The Maharta referred to was a Hindu Chief, who had sided with Humayun and against whom Khawas, *Sher Shah's Chief Lieutenant, was fighting. Humayun's troops were taken totally by surprise at the Afghans' onset. In any case there could have been but little chance for them. But even that little chance Humayun threw away. Despising the enemy, being as the historian says, a lion in bravery and in the full pride of his youth and confidence in his forces, he made no dispositions to meet the foe. The Afghans pushed on in steady order, and in a minute almost the whole Moghul force was routed. Baggage, treasure, harems, including that of the Emperor, all fell into the hands of the Conqueror.

---

A. D. 1539.

The women in the last named were treated with all due respect, and the ladies of the Imperial household were shortly sent to the Court to Agra. Humayun himself was slightly wounded and though unwilling, was forced by his followers to fly. Plunging into the river, he lost his horse and was saved by a water-carrier, Nizam, who gave him his inflated water-skin and with its help got him across. Humayun promised Nizam to seat him on his throne, which promise he afterwards fulfilled in Agra by seating him on it for half a day. With much difficulty and after having been in danger of being taken more than once he escaped to Agra; there he was received as Emperor by both his brothers, Kamran and Hindal; but he had left behind him the best of his troops. Eight thousand veteran Moghul soldiers are said to have been killed or taken in the disastrous field of Chausa. The troops left in Bengal were hopelessly cut off. For a time they maintained an unequal struggle, but finally were totally dispersed, and it is said that only one man of note amongst them ever rejoined Humayun. Sher Shah on the evening after the battle related to his chiefs that he had dreamt in the previous night that both he and Humayun had been brought into the presence of the prophet of God, and that the latter had taken the crown and cap of authority from Humayun's head and put it on his directing him to rule with justice. Another story is that, like Richard III, he only declared himself King after considerable pressure from the Afghan nobles—in any case he was now proclaimed Badshah; the Khutba was read in his name, the kettle drums were beaten in his honour, and for nine days rejoicing was universal in his camp.

But festivities never detained Sher Shah long from serious business—he pushed his troops up the Ganges as far as Kalpi—a long way above Allahabad: and letters and troops were sent to Malwa and Gujarat, to announce his accession to the Badshahate and to demand help to expel the Moghuls.

These measures were not indeed immediately, completely successful. But still they were so far helpful that no help to Humayun came from the South and West in the impending struggle. The Khan Khanan, Humayun's chief adviser who had been taken at Monghyr and who had recommended Humayun to crush Sher Shah years before, though an Afghan, was put to death. He was accused of having been the instrument that brought Baber from Kabul to Delhi and of having afterwards persuaded him to stay in the country. Humayun had been accompanied by his brother Askari to Agra. There they met the other two brothers. Hindal underwent the humiliation of being personally interrogated in public as to his revolt and of being publicly pardoned. Kamran was solicitous that Humayun should stay behind, and that he should march at the head of the troops against the Afghans. This Humayun declined to permit, nor would he agree to Kamran's retiring, as when his first request was refused, he wished to go to Lahore. But Kamran fell ill; the climate of Agra disagreed with him, and Humayun was finally forced to let him go; with him went his troops, Moghuls who had not been in the past battles. On the one side there were a band of mercenaries, the Moghul troops, disheartened by defeat, with no fixed confidence in their leaders, and corrupted by habits of luxury. On the other hand were the great tribal Afghan levies, which constantly got augmentations by new comers from their native hills, flushed with victory and led by chiefs in whom they had the trust, which arises from constant victory. The final contest was fought near Kanauj. The Imperial army crossed the Ganges to the Eastern side and there confronted the Afghans. Mirza Haidar, the cousin of Humayun, and author of the Tarikh-i-Rashidi who had become the King's friend according to the fashion of the Moghuls, gives us a most graphic description of the Moghul camp and of the battle that ensued. The Imperial troops had with them some heavy artillery which proved quite useless. They had an excess of baggage and of non-fighters and were altogether different in composition from the light marching hardy troops who had won for Baber the battle of Paniput. He tells us how the battle took place during the height of the rains, how desertions were numerous, and how he pressed on Humayun the necessity of fighting. He goes on to describe the battle thus: “*On the 10th of Mohorrum, 947, we mounted to carry the plan into effect, and made our dispositions. As had been determined, the carriages and mortars and small guns were placed in the centre. The command of the guns was given to Muhammad Khan Rumi, to the sons of Ustad Ali Kuli, to Ustad Ahmad Rumi and Husain Khalifa. They placed the carriages and mortars in their proper positions, and stretched chains between them. In other divisions there were Amirs of no repute—men who were Amirs (nobles) only in name. They had got possession of the country, but they had not a tincture of prudence or knowledge, or energy or emulation, or dignity of mind or generosity—qualities from which nobility draws its name.

The Emperor had posted the author of this work upon his left, so that his right flank should be on the Emperor's left. In the same position he had placed a force of chosen troops. On my left all my retainers were stationed. I had 400 chosen men inured to warfare and familiar with battle, fifty of whom were mounted on horses accoutred with armour. Between me and the river (jui-bar) there was a force of twenty seven Amirs, all of whom carried the tugh (banner). In this position also, were the other components of the left wing, and they must be judged of by the others. On the day of battle, when Sher Khan, having formed his divisions, marched out, of all these twenty-seven banners not one was to be seen, for the great nobles had hidden them, in the apprehension that the enemy might advance upon them. The soldiership and bravery of the Amirs may be conceived from this exhibition of courage.

Sher Khan came out in five divisions of 1,000 men each, and in advance of him were three thousand men. I estimated the whole as being less than 15,000, but calculated the Chaghatai force at about 40,000, all mounted on Kipchak horses, and clad in iron armour. They surged like the waves of the sea, but the courage of the Amirs and officers of the army was such as I have described. When Sher Khan's army came out of its entrenchment, two divisions (jauk) which seemed to be equal to four divisions, drew up in that place, and three divisions advanced against their opponents. On one side I was leading the centre, to take up the position which I had selected; but when we reached the ground, we were unable to occupy it, for every Amir and Vazir in the Chaghatai army, whether he be rich or poor, had his camp followers (ghulams). An Amir of note, with his 100 retainers and followers, has 500 servants and ghulams, who on the day of battle render no assistance to their masters and have no control over themselves, so in whatever place there was a conflict, the ghulams were entirely ungovernable. When they lost their masters they were seized with panic and blindly rushed about in terror. In short, it was impossible to hold our ground. They so pressed us on the rear, that they drove the centre upon the chains stretched between the chariots, and they and the soldiers dashed each other upon them. Those who were behind, so pressed upon those who were in front that they broke through the chains. The men who were posted by the chains were driven beyond them, and the few who remained behind were broken, so that all formation was destroyed. Such was the state of the centre. On the right Sher Khan advanced in battle array; but before an arrow was discharged, the camp-followers fled like chaff before the wind, and breaking the line, they all pressed towards the centre. The ghulams whom the commanders had sent to the front, rushed to the lines of chariots, and the whole array was broken: the Mir was separated from his men, and the men from the Mir. While the centre was thus thrown into disorder, all the fugitives from the right bore down upon it. So, before the enemy had discharged an arrow, the whole army was scattered and defeated. I had estimated the Chaghatai army as numbering 40,000 men, excluding the camp-followers (ghulam) and workmen (shagird peshá). They fled before 10,000 men, and Sher Khan gained a victory, while the Chaghatai were defeated on this battlefield, where not a man, neither friend or foe, was wounded. Not a gun was fired, and the chariots (gardun) were useless."

* Tarikh-i-Rashidi, pp. 475, 477.

Humayun got on an elephant, and with the greatest difficulty crossed the river. He fled to Agra, but his reign was over. Fourteen years had elapsed—the battle of Kanauj was fought in the middle of A.D. 1540 since the battle of Paniput; during that short time the Moghul power had grown like Jonah's gourd to an enormous height, and again with serious opposition had become less and finally had disappeared. It was over, I say, but not for ever; another fifteen years, and then it came again. One great fact it had in its favour; whereas the Afghan Kings who supplanted the Moghuls were the sons of nobodies, the Moghul Leader was a descendant of Taimur and Chenghiz. As a Taimurid he could claim to be the legal Emperor, for since Taimur's invasion, one of his descendants was always considered to be the de jure King of Hindustan, Sayid and Lodi rulers at Delhi having simply professed that they were the absent Taimurids' vicegerents; and Taimur and Chenghiz were then, and have to quite a recent day been, the two names with which to conjure throughout the greater part of the Eastern world. They were the two men, to whom the disposer of thrones had by unmistakable signs given the rule of this world; and to the Eastern no argument is so potent in favour of a particular family as that it has the Almighty on its side, and that its destiny is to rule.

---

CHAPTER XII.

BOTH Sher Shah and Humayun ascribed the rout at Kanauj to providential intervention. The former told his chiefs the day after the battle that he had dreamt on the previous night that he and Humayun had wrestled between the two armies, that after long and keen struggles he had been thrown by the Emperor on the ground, and that Humayun had tried to lift him up but could not prevail, which dream he interpreted as a message from the most High that he, Sher Shah, was to retain possession of the land of Hindustan; Humayun on his side ascribed his defeat to supernatural beings fighting in his opponent's ranks. Never again did he face Sher Shah; from Agra he fled to Delhi on hearing of the Afghan's approach, and from Delhi to Lahore where he found his brother Kamran. But even there he found no respite, for the Afghans joined by fellow countrymen from all parts, pushed steadily on. Some of Kamran's men were willing to fight; but Kamran himself had had enough of Hindustan. He preferred to rule the cool highlands of Kabul with undisputed sway, rather than to enter into a doubtful struggle for the Empire, the result of which could only have been to make his brother again his Sovereign. And so he departed for Kabul, taking his brother Askari with him, Hindal attending Humayun who departed from Lahore towards the South-West. Mirza Haidar at the same time went from Lahore to Kashmir; under the King of Kashgar, Sayid Khan, he had marched into that country some years previously on the occasion of a raid by that ruler, and had been fascinated by its beauty as well as convinced of the easiness of its conquest. So, being called in by one of the factions, that at the time struggled for rule he with a small band of followers marched into the valley and took bloodless possession. There he reigned with success for some years until he was slain in A.D. 1551.

Humayun made for Scinde, which was at the time under the rule of the Arghuns, hoping either to establish himself there, or to use it as a stepping-off ground for an invasion of Gujarat. His plans met with no success. The story of his wanderings is told in great detail by Jauhar, a personal attendant, who was constantly in his service from the days of the Kanauj fight till his wanderings ended in Persia. Jauhar's memoirs are one of the few works concerning Indian Muhammedan history, which is not overladen with Oriental Metaphor, and in which plain unvanishing truths appear. Humayun tried to get possession by a siege of Bhakar, one of the most important towns on the Lower Indus, but in vain; his followers fell off; he had to abandon all attempts at carving out for himself a principality, however small in size, and had finally to quit the country altogether. During this part of his career, he suffered the greatest privations; often there was but little food for his followers to eat, who suffered also from a scarcity of horses and baggage cattle; worse still these journeys being largely amongst the sandy wastes near the Indus he and those with him were at times almost perishing with thirst. It was during these wanderings that Humayun's renowned son, Akbar, was born. His mother was the daughter of Hindal's preceptor (or rather spiritual guide). Amarkot, an oasis in the sandy deserts of Jessalmir, has the honour of being the place of his birth, which event took place on the 15th of October 1542. Jauhar tells us that the Emperor was about twelve kos (twenty-four miles) from Amarkot when this joyful event happened. He, Jauhar, was asked what treasure had been committed to his charge. His reply was that he had had 200 ashrafis (gold pieces), a silver wristlet and a musk bag with him; but that the former had been restored at the Emperor's own orders to their owners; so that the musk bag alone remained. This the Emperor ordered to be broken on a china plate and distributed amongst the nobles as a present in honour of the auspicious event. To such a pass had the son of the royal Kalender Baber come. It was while in these deserts that he was joined by Bairam Beg (also called Bairam Khan). This nobleman of Persian descent, destined to become the leading man in the State in the early part of Akbar's reign, was one of the most faithful of the Moghul's adherents. After Kanauj he had fled to a Hindu Raja who, fearing Sher Shah's wrath, had given him up to that Ruler's lieutenants. Directed to accompany Sher Shah in the expedition which the latter made to Malwa, he in a conversation with Sher Shah told the latter that real attachment never changes—a remark which prevented his advancement—for Sher Shah noticing his great qualities had treated him heretofore liberally. From the Afghan camp he escaped with difficulty. Being seized on his flight along with Abdul Kasim Khan, a noble of fine countenance and large stature, who was taken for him, he tried to save the latter's life by declaring that he and not Abdul Kasim was Bairam Khan. But the other said "See how my faithful servant to save me is willing thus to run into danger; do him no injury, poor fellow—let him go.” Bairam accordingly was released. Abdul Kasim was taken before Sher Shah who had him put to death. Sher Shah had great qualities; but neither generosity nor truthfulness were amongst them.

Humayun on leaving the inhospitable Indus made for Kandahar, then a part of Kamran's domain. On his way he learnt that Askari Mirza with a considerable force was coming to seize him. According to one account he was forewarned by a former trooper of his who, having been sent to reconnoitre, rode up and told him what was intended; anyhow he got away and just in time. Abandoning any hope of Kandahar, he continued his journey rapidly Westward, and after many adventures, entered the Persian Province of Seistan. Previous to doing this he had sent word to Shah Tahmasp, the King of Persia, that he was throwing himself on his hospitality. To this King this message was a cause of great joy. He had the kettledrums beaten for three days and sent a letter to Humayun to the effect that it would give him the greatest pleasure to meet him. Shah Tahmasp was a Shiah, and hoped to induce the royal fugitive to embrace this creed; he was also a King and an Eastern King and wished to indulge his pride and to display to his subjects the sight, so glorious in him and their estimation, of his receiving as a suppliant the King of such a wide realm as Hindustan. Kings' methods of conversion are not those of the ordinary missionary. When sending a dress of honour to Humayun he included along with it the Persian cap, which bears the symbols of the twelve Imams, the great saints of the Shiah faith. This, Humayun declined to put on. Again, the King of Persia sent a message to him that if he adopted the Shiah faith he would protect and cherish him, but otherwise he would give him and his followers to the flames. Humayun did to a certain extent accede to Shah Tahmasp's wishes and did conform to a certain extent to the Shiah faith, this is certain. How far he did so, is a different matter. The historians of the Delhi Court give us here no help.

Shah Tahmasp received Humayun in the first instance in great state. As to this first reception we read:

*“The Shah received Humayun with honour, and placed him on a cushion on his right hand. But his religious zeal was not long in betraying itself.” After making some enquiries concerning his health and the fatigues of the journey, he said, “You will put on the taj” (or Persian cap). Humayun (taking advantage of the ambiguity of the term) answered, “The taj (crown) is a mark of greatness. I will put it on.” The Shah, with his own royal hands, then placed the cap on the Emperor’s head on which the Shah, and all the Khans and Sultans raised a shout, calling out “Allah, Allah,” and bending down their heads, as in prayer, according to their custom. The Emperor then asked that the Mirzas might be allowed to be seated, but was told by the Shah that such was not etiquette. An entertainment, served by the Emperor’s butler, followed. The Sovereigns ate together. When it was finished, there was another general shout and prostration, in honour of the coming of so great a potentate to the foot of the Royal Throne. To the spectators in general it must have appeared as if the Indian Prince had conformed to the Persian usages and faith.”

On further occasions the Shah’s arrogance constantly showed itself. On one occasion he received Humayun seated on a small carpet on which there was no room for Humayun to sit. In the East the right of one to sit with one’s equal is guarded with great jealousy, and Shah Tahmasp intended by this act to show that he did not consider Humayun his equal. A Moghul noticing this tore open the ornamented cover of his quiver and spread it for Humayun to sit. Subsequently he was generously rewarded by the Emperor for this act.

Finally Shah Tahmasp was persuaded, probably largely by Bairam Khan, himself a Shiah, to act generously to Humayun. The latter was given a large body of troops wherewith to conquer Kandahar. This, when taken, was to be held by Humayun as a part of the Persian Kingdom or at least as a feudatory to it. With these troops in A.D. 1544, Humayun left the Persian Court resolved, doubtless, like the person of whom I wrote in my accounts of Baber, never, if he could possibly help it, to see the Court or Country of Persia again, and it is here I must for the present leave him and turn my attention to the Afghan King of Hindustan, Sher Shah.

---

* Erskine, Vol. II, p. 283.

CHAPTER XIII.

SHER Shah, after the crowning victory at Kanauj, advanced rapidly and soon became possessed of Agra, Delhi and Lahore. When the Moghuls under Humayun and Kamran left the last-named place, Sher Shah's only care was that they should leave Hindustan, and so he made no attempt to cut them off in their retreat. Advancing slowly beyond Lahore, he got out of the region of unbroken plains and found himself involved in guerilla hostilities with the robber tribe of Gukkars. To quell them, he determined to build a strong fortress, which he named after his Behar fortress, Rohtas. Tradition says that one Todar Khatri, who was employed to build this castle, at first could find no labour, that in reporting this to Sher Shah, the latter told him that he had chosen him as a man of discretion and would supply him with whatever funds he might demand, so that money was to be no consideration; that accordingly Todar Khatri offered an ashrafi (gold mohur) for every stone brought, that this munificent offer induced numerous Gakkar labourers to come and work in spite of the boycott which their chiefs had desired to enforce; that once having got labourers to work he gradually reduced their wages until these became not much above the ordinary wage, and that in this way the Fort was built. Anyhow, after costing much money and labour, it was built; but although made a place of great strength, it never became of much use. It did nothing to impede subsequent invasions, and the Moghuls seem afterwards to have made but little use of it.

While in North-West India the chiefs of Roh came to wait upon their countrymen. Amongst them Abbas Khan, the historian, tells us was his, Abbas Khan's, grandfather. He thus relates what took place at the meeting:

•“ The writer's grandfather, Sheikh Bayazid Kalkapur Sarwani, who was the successor to the very holy Sheikh Ahmad Sarwani, who was the grandfather of Sheikh Malhi Kayal, whose holiness and glory is famous all over the country of Roh, and whose disciples and followers most of the Afghans are, and whose descendants are celebrated for their austerity and for the strictness of their devotional observances, and who are also known for their gallantry and wealth ; nor does any person excel them in honour and consideration ; the whole race of Afghans acknowledge their greatness and their own, and their ancestors' virtues ; this said Sheikh Bayazid came to Sher Shah at Khushab, and had an interview with him.

Since the previous Kings, of whom I have treated in this history, paid extreme respect to Sheikh Bayazid, he was very anxious as to whether Sher Shah would or would not show him the same civilities. The moment Sheikh Bayazid came unto Sher Shah's durbar, the latter came forward several steps to receive him, and abasing himself gave Sheikh Bayazid precedence. My grandfather expected that Sher Shah would give him his hand, but he said : “ Embrace me.” When he took leave also, he showed every sign of respect in friendship. When he returned towards Bengal, Sher Shah sent him back to Roh and gave him one lac of tankas in cash, as well as Bengal silks and clothes of Hindustan. The Sheikh said :—“ Since the time of the Langahs the Biluchis have possessed themselves of the rent-free tenures of my predecessors.” Sher Shah ordered that Ismail Khan, Biluch, should receive instead the pargana of Ninduna, in the Gakkar country, and that the Biluchis should be made to restore to Sheikh Bayazid, the rightful owner, the land of the Sarwanis, which they usurped. Ismail Khan dared not disobey the orders of Sher Shah, so he took Parganah Ninduna and the Ghakkar villages, and restored the Sarwanis' land to Shaikh Bayazid.”

My English readers will notice how, in the writer's mind, austerities are quite compatible with gallantry and wealth. In a Muhammedan's mind austerity is not joined with abstinence from marriage nor from the world in general. The holy men of the East—they are not priests, for Islam recognises no priest, only learned men—have always had much influence, sometimes for good, oftener perhaps for evil. We shall meet them again in the reign of Akbar. After returning to Bengal to put down an incipient rebellion there and then proceeding to receive the surrender of the fortress of Gwalior which had held out for the Moghuls, Sher Shah turned his attention towards Malwa. Mallu Khan, one of the principal officers of the old King, had succeeded in the unsettled days, which followed Humayun's retreat, in establishing himself as ruler of that kingdom and had taken the name of Kader Shah. When Sher Shah, prior to the battle of Kanauj, had written to him asking him to attack Humayun, he had sealed the letter at the top—a form in the East used by a superior addressing an inferior. Mallu Khan strongly resenting the insult, answered by a letter also sealed at the top. On this letter's receipt Sher Shah tore off the seal and placed it at the point of his sword declaring that if he ever met Mallu Khan he should know in what way to remind him of the indignity. On Sher Shah's invading Malwa, Mallu Khan found himself unable to contend with him. So making his peace, he attended his Durbar, where he was well received. Sher Shah took the opportunity of his army being on the march to show him its order. Mallu Khan saw with wonder and admiration that at every stage they threw up earthen entrenchments and that at no time was there any relaxation of discipline. Addressing the Afghan soldiers he said :—

* Elliott, Vol. IV, p. 388.

*“ You submit yourselves to wonderful labours and exertions, night and day you have no rest; ease and comforts are things forbidden to you.” The Afghan replied—“ Such is our master's custom. It behoves a soldier, whatever service his chief may order, or whatever labour or exertion he may require, not to consider it a hardship. Ease is for women, it is shameful to honourable men.”

It was Sher Shah's strong will, and this alone that had brought this state of things about. Ordinarily the Afghan of history has been one of the least amenable races to military restraint. Finding that although his reception in Durbar was gracious his position was precarious, and that Sher Shah had no intention of letting him remain in Malwa, Mallu Khan fled, and in spite of attempts made to catch him managed to escape to Gujarat.

* Elliott, Vol. IV, p. 393.

Sher Shah was now the ruler of the greater part of Hindustan. The plain lands near the two great rivers, the Indus and the Ganges and their tributaries, which constitute by far the larger portion of Hindustan had now come into his possession, but the Rajput country, save at its borders, did not acknowledge his sway. First of all he marched against Puran Mal at the Fort Raisin. This Puran Mal had once before gone on invitation into his presence. While away, his wife is recorded as having said : * " I will then break my fast when I shall see Puran Mal again, and the whole time he is away I will sit on a bastion of the fort and watch for his return." Her husband did return, and so she had no occasion for showing her devotedness by starvation.

The reason for Sher Shah's attacking him is thus given by the historian : † " Puran Mal, who has enslaved the families of the Mussulmans in Chanderi and has made dancing-girls of their daughters, and did not accompany my son Kutb Khan—him I will so punish that he may be a warning to others that hereafter no unbelievers in Hind may oppress and injure the families of Mussulmans."

After making this resolve, in a time of illness, we are told by the Muhammedan historian that he had a speedy recovery, doubtless the old story that nothing is so pleasing to God as the blood of an unbeliever. Thereupon he besieged Raisin. The siege lasted for six months, the besiegers preferring the slow method of bombardment and starvation to the more speedy methods of assault. Finally, Puran Mal determined to surrender, and this he did on condition that he received no injury to property or person. This was confirmed by the most solemn oaths. The sequel I give in the very words of Abbas Khan : —

‡ " After some days the widows of the chief men of Chanderi and others waited for Sher Shah by the roadside and cried out to him. Sher Shah asked who they were, and ordered them to be brought to him. They said: "We have suffered from this inhuman and malignant infidel all kinds of tyranny and oppression. He has slain our husbands, our daughters he has enslaved, and has made dancing-girls of them, and has seized our lands, and all our wordly goods, for a long time past. If you do not give us justice, hereafter, in the day of resurrection, when the first and the last of all men shall be collected together, we will accuse you." As Sher Shah was a believing and just ruler, on hearing these zeal-stirring words of the oppressed, the tears dropped from his eyes, and he said: "Have patience, for I have brought him out, by promise and oaths." They replied: "Consult with your Ulema, and act upon the decision they shall pronounce." When Sher Shah came back to his tent, he sent for all the Ulema who accompanied his victorious army, and related one by one the inhuman deeds Puran Mal had committed with respect to the wives and families of the Mussulmans, and asked them to give their decision. Amir Sheikh Rafiudin and the other Ulema who accompanied the victorious army pronounced a decision for the death of Puran Mal.

* Elliott, Vol. IV. p. 392

† Elliott, Vol. IV. p. 397.

‡ Elliott, Vol. IV. pp. 401-403.

At night, orders were given to Isa Khan Hajib, that he should desire his troops to collect with the elephants in all haste at a certain spot, for that Sher Shah intended to make a forced march towards Gondwana. To Hajib Khan he gave secret orders that he should watch Bhaia Puran Mal and take care he did not fly, and not to speak a word of this to any living creature, for that he (Sher Shah) had long entertained this design. When the elephants and troops were at the appointed spot, they reported it. Sher Shah ordered that at sunrise they should surround the tents of Bhaia Puran Mal. Puran Mal was told that they were surrounding his encampment, and going into the tent of his beloved wife Ratnavali, who sang Hindi melodies very sweetly, he cut off her head, and coming out said to his companions: "I have done this; do you also slay your wives and families?" While the Hindus were employed in putting their women and families to death, the Afghans on all sides commenced the slaughter of the Hindus. Puran Mal and his companions, like hogs at bay, failed not to exhibit valour and gallantry, but in the twinkling of an eye all were slain. Such of their wives and families as were not slain were captured. One daughter of Puran Mal and three sons of his elder brother were taken alive, the rest were all killed. Sher Khan gave the daughter of Puran to some itinerant minstrels (bazigaran), that they might make her dance in the bazars, and ordered the boys to be castrated, that the race of the oppressor might not increase.

Most of our accounts of Sher Shah are from the Court historians of the Moghuls, and hence much said about him, like much said about the house of York in English history, must be taken with due allowance for hostile feeling. But Abbas Khan is by no means prejudiced against Sher Shah, and he tells the whole story without the slightest sign of disapproval, nay one might say rather, that he thinks that Sher Shah acted quite rightly. In the East as in the West indeed, there has been cruelty enough; but the cruelty is never so repulsive, the treachery so often accompanying it never so hateful, as when it falls under a religious cloak; as in Europe never have deeds more repulsive and hateful been done than those which have been sanctioned by the formula that no faith is to be kept with heretics.

After this Sher Shah marched into Marwar, A.D. 1544, against its ruler Maldeo. He managed to disperse the latter's army by the old stratagem of having forged letters written purporting to be to him from Maldeo's nobles in which promises were made to desert in the day of battle. In spite of the protestation of these nobles that the letters were forged, Maldeo insisted on retiring. To wipe off the stain on their honour, some of the chiefs implicated led a most daring attack on the Afghan camp where, after a desperate struggle, the Rajputs were overpowered by numbers. In reference to this fight Sher Shah was heard to exclaim: "How nearly had I thrown away the Empire of Delhi in seeking for a handful of Bajri." * Marwar, the present state of Jodhpur, is one of the most sandy of all the sandy * Bajri, a coarse Indian millet.

Rajput states. From Marwar Sher Shah marched to Chitor ; but the glory of that state was temporarily under a cloud, and a timely submission saved the Raja and his people from a repetition of Bahadur Shah's invasion ten years previous. Thence he marched to Kalinjar. Here also he was carrying on, as he professed, a religious war against infidels. But the historian tells us also that the King had heard of the exceeding beauty of a dancing-girl within the walls and was meditating how he might take the place without the Raja's making a jouhar and without the girl's being burned. Religion and dancing-girls, a strange mixture, but perhaps not so strange as those who are ignorant of history may think. It was here he met his death. A shell exploding burnt him so severely that he died from its injuries a few hours afterwards. This happened in May 1545 A.D. When he knew that he was mortally wounded he expressed a hope that the fort would be taken during his lifetime. This was done ; the place was stormed ; by the time of afternoon prayers it was captured and its defenders, save seventy who escaped, were in the words of the Muhammedan author sent to hell. So died Sher Shah one of the greatest of India's rulers. Only five years had elapsed from the date of the battle at Kanauj, which elevated him to the lordship of India ; but these five years had been years of intense work. Roads had been made from Bengal to the North-West frontier, serais and mosques built along them, trees had been planted, and a system of posts established. Steps had been taken to extend the revenue system which he had employed in the two paternal pergannahs to the whole country* ; violent crime had been put down ; even-handed justice was everywhere meted out, and the country was settling down at his death in an orderly fashion unknown since the days of Taimur's invasion.

If further time had been given him, if his reign had begun when he was younger and lasted longer, it is quite possible that he would have been able to have raised an Indian power, which for a considerable time at least, would have resisted all invasions from the North-West. But as it was, his time was too short ; he left no successor competent to carry out his work ; his policy towards the Hindus was not such as to make them friendly to his dynasty, and when invasion came again from the North-West, his Kingdom in the hands of his descendants fell to pieces like a house of cards. He is buried in a noble mausoleum at Sahseram, now the head-quarters of a sub-division of the Arrah District, a grand mass of Afghan architecture, not far from the Fort Rhotas and in the centre of the scenes of his early activity. It was in his reign and by his direction that Patna became the chief town of Behar ; previously the town Behar was the capital of the province. He had a fort built in the former place and all the Government work was withdrawn from the former capital. Abbas Khan passes an encomium on Sher Shah in the following terms :—

---

* The basis of this, it must be remembered, was a measurement ; formerly there was no such thing as a measurement of each field singly ; pergannahs paid so much and the revenue payable was roughly divided amongst the villages.

* “From the day that Sher Shah was established on the throne, no man dared to breathe in opposition to him ; nor did any one raise the standard of contumacy or rebellion against him ; nor was any heart-tormenting thorn produced in the garden of his kingdom ; nor was there any of his nobles or soldiery, or a thief or a robber, who dared to direct the eye of dishonesty to the property of another ; nor did any theft or robbery ever occur in his dominions. Travellers and wayfarers, during the time of Sher Shah’s reign, were relieved from the trouble of keeping watch ; nor did they fear to halt even in the midst of a desert. They encamped at night at every place, desert or inhabited, without fear ; they placed their goods and property on the plain, and turned out their mules to graze, and themselves slept with minds at ease and free from care, as if in their own house ; and the Zamindars, for fear any mischief should occur to the travellers, and that they should suffer or be arrested on account of it, kept watch over them. And in the time of Sher Shah’s rule, a decrepit old woman might place a basketful of gold ornaments on her head and go on a journey, and no thief or robber would come near her, for fear of the punishments which Sher Shah inflicted. 'Such a shadow spread over the world, that a decrepit person feared not a Rustom.' During this time, all quarrelling, disputing, fighting, and turmoil, which is the nature of the Afghans, was altogether quieted and put a stop to throughout the countries of Roh and of Hindustan."

* Elliott, Vol. IV. pp. 432-433.

CHAPTER XII.

WITH Sher Shah's death this time of felicity came to an end. His son and successor, Selim Shah, was as stern as his father, but without his father's genius. His reign was marked by endeavours to abase the Afghan Chiefs who surrounded his throne. This he did much as Ibrahim had done thirty years before, and the result was the same in both cases that when foreign invasion came there was no competent force to resist.

Selim Shah was the second son of his father. The eldest, Adil Shah, at the time of his father's death was away from the army at the Fort of Rantambhor. An immediate succession was imperative, and the troops at Kalinjar raised Selim Shah, who was on the spot, to the throne. On his accession he immediately wrote to his elder brother stating that he had been constrained against his will to assume for a time the title of a sovereign, but that his intention was to surrender this shortly to his elder brother. He accordingly requested him to accompany him to Agra. This the elder brother did on certain of the great nobles guaranteeing his safety; an attempt at treacherously seizing him failed, and after meeting his brother and paying him homage he was granted the Jagir of Biyana, which he had chosen for himself. But within two months Selim Shah's suspicions were aroused and he sent Ghazi Mahali, one of his chief officers, to Biyana with a pair of golden fetters and with directions to bind Adil Shah and then bring him to Court. The latter appealed to Khawas Khan, who had been first of all Sher Shah's slave and finally his right hand man, and who at the time was the Governor of Mewat (Ulwar). The Ghazi was at the latter's direction himself bound in the fetters he had brought. This of course meant open war. Adil Shah and Khawas Khan got together their forces and made a sudden dash at Agra. On the way, however, they passed by Sikri (now known as Fattehpur Sikri), the residence of the Chishtis, one of the holiest families in India. It was the eve of the Shab Barat, a great Muhammedan festival. There they delayed so long over their prayers and other religious exercises that they did not reach Agra till next day when the sun was high. Letters had already been sent by them to the chief nobles of the Court, asking them to desert, and many had promised to do so. But Afghans do not desert in the daytime, as I have already stated in writing concerning the battle of Paniput, and the consequence of their late arrival was that in the battle that ensued, the rebels did not get the help they hoped from a section of the royal forces. It was with difficulty that Selim Shah was induced by his wisest advisers not to retreat to Chunar, where lay the royal treasure. But once having determined to fight he fought bravely, and the rebels were totally defeated.

Selim Shah's favourite residence was Gwalior. The fortifications of this place he greatly strengthened. He also built Selimgarh, a suburb of Delhi, the ruins of which lie to the South of the present Delhi gate. Rhotas Fort in the Ghakkar country he finished. The author of the Tarikh-i-Daudi says, as regards his building, that his performances can only be compared with the work done by the genii by order of Hazrat Suliman (King Solomon).

Besides building, his reign was, as I have already said, chiefly taken up with cutting off the heads of the tall poppies. Budauni says, speaking of his treatment of the Afghan Nobles that he swept them off like men from a chess-board. The details of all this dismal work need not long detain us. On one occasion we are told, Sind Khan, the brother of Azam Humayan, who was one of the chiefs of the Niazi clan, was taken by the King into the interior of his harem and there shown a number of heads ranged on the wall, and was asked if he recognised any of them. Sind Khan without losing countenance told him who some of them were—these some including chief men of the State. On another occasion he had a number of his prisoners blown up with gunpowder in their prison at Gwalior. On Azam Humayun's rebelling, he persecuted the whole Niazi clan with the greatest violence. The men were put to death, the women dishonoured. In this respect he was a great contrast with Sher Shah who never warred on women (provided they were Muhammedan). Shujaat Khan of Malwa revolted on account of his suspicion that Selim Shah had instigated an Afghan who had a personal grievance against him to assassinate him. He was defeated and driven out of Malwa; to this country he was, however, afterwards allowed to return. On one occasion, indeed, we read of Selim Shah having played a noble part. An assassin having attempted to kill him, it was suggested that he should be interrogated as to his instigators. "No," said Selim Shah, "put the wretch to death at once lest he make false accusations against innocent persons." This speech may, however, be referred to worldly policy as much as to nobility of character. On the Moghuls' threatening an invasion of the North-West he meditated the destruction of Lahore, an idea strongly held by Sher Shah. From a strategic point such a destruction would have been doubtless wise, as Lahore has ever been a half-way house. Selim Shah died in A.D. 1553, and with his death went the remains of the greatness of the Sur dynasty. It struggled on for a few years, but its greatness had departed. It owed its existence first to Sher Shah's surpassing genius, and secondly to the common feeling animating the Afghans of India against the Moghuls. With the driving power dead and with the Afghans again returning to their normal state of quarrelling amongst themselves, it had no power of life, and so it has remained an episode only in Indian history. The Moghul, as we shall see, was all this time either dreaming of or preparing his return.

During Sher Shah's time there was much excitement in the Indian Muhammedan world owing to the teaching of one Sheikh Alai, whose father had been a favourite pupil of Sheikh Selim Chishti. This Sheikh Alai had adopted the doctrines of the Mehdevis, an heretical Arabian sect, and taught the same with great zeal. Brought to Court he was sentenced to banishment to Hindia (near the Vindhya); there he managed to gain the Governor over to his views; recalled to Court, he refused to retract, and Selim Shah, though reluctant, ordered him to be scourged. "At the third stroke of the lash he resigned," so says the historian, "his soul to his creator." We shall hear more of these heterodox sects of Muhammedans in Akbar's reign. Almost all of them held Sufi doctrines. Islam, as a religion, is singularly unspiritual. It is this craving for spirituality, for mysticism for a communion with God deeper than and totally different from anything that Islam offered with its prescribed ritual, that has raised these sects. Quietism and illumination has raised such sects everywhere throughout Christian Europe, but not to nearly such an extent as in Islam as the spiritual elements in Christianity allow thousands of mystics and pietists within the pale of its churches, whereas orthodox Muhammedanism repels the mystics brought up within it.

CHAPTER XIV.

WITH Selim Shah's death anarchy full and complete sprang up. His son, aged twelve, was murdered by his maternal uncle, Mubariz Khan, who assumed the title of Sultan Muhammad Adil Shah. But competitors sprang up for the throne from the Sur family; one of whom took upon himself the title of Sikander Shah in the Punjab; and another Ibrahim Shah declared himself Padshah at Agra and Delhi itself. A fourth member of the Sur family declared himself King of Bengal; and Shujaat Khan made himself independent in Malwa. Adil Shah was a vicious ne'er do well, but was fortunate in having as his Prime Minister a Hindu of the Bakkal or grocer caste named Himu. *By his low wit and pleantry it is said Himu rose from obscurely selling his worthless wares in a narrow lane among his wretched companions to be employed as a purveyor by Selim Shah ; gradually he rose until he became Adil Shah's Prime Minister. Mean of stature, unable to ride on horseback, he showed indomitable spirit and proved himself, as long as he lived, the main stay of Adil's throne. A story told of an incident which occurred at the palace on the King's accession will show better than any description, the character of the Afghan of the time. Erskine tells us :

* Erskine, Vol. II, p. 490.

* " Sultan Muhammad, who did not often appear in public, having one day held a public durbar in the Fort of Gwalior, proceeded, in the presence of his most distinguished nobles, to make a distribution of various jagirs. Among the rest, the Government of Kanauj, which was held by Shah Muhammad Firmuli, a nobleman of an eminent Afghan family, was taken from him, and conferred on Sirmast Khan Sirpani, also an Afghan, but of inferior note. Sikander Khan, Firmuli's son, a youth of handsome milen, but of a lofty and impatient temper, who, as well as his father, was present when this arrangement was announced, exclaimed, " What, are things come to such a pass, that our estate is to be given to a set of Sirpani dog merchants ? " at the same time audibly hinting something about the field of battle. His father who was unwell, chid him for indulging in such language, and attempted to restrain his impetuosity, but in vain. Turning on his father, he asked him if he had forgotten that Sher Shah, intending to put him to death had kept him in an iron cage, from which he had been released only at the intercession of Selim Shah ? Did he not see that it was once more the plan of the Sur family to bring ruin on them and their race ? Was he blind, or was he so dastardly as tamely to submit to such contemptuous treatment ? This violent conduct occasioned considerable confusion in the Durbar. Sirmast Khan, a tall and powerful man, approached Sikander in a conciliating manner, saying, " My son, why all these hard words ? " at the same time laying his hand soothingly on the young man's shoulder, but intending to secure him and make him prisoner. Sikander, aware of his object, drew his dagger, and plunged it into the breast of Surmast, who fell lifeless on the ground. The uproar and confusion upon this became extreme. Sikander, infuriated with passion, drew his sword and attacked those nobles near him who attempted to secure his person, killing some, and wounding others. The King, availing himself of the disorder that prevailed, made his escape into the harem, then the doors were barred behind him. He was followed by Sikander, who made an attempt to force his way in, but it was too late. Several Amirs drawing their swords prevented Sikander's escape while he continued for sometime to slash around him like a mad man. At last Ibrahim Khan Sur, who had married Adil's sister, wounded him with his sword, and other Amirs rushing on overpowered him and put him to death. Daulat Khan Lohani, at the same time, with one blow of his sabre, slew Shah Muhammad Firmuli, the unhappy and innocent father. The whole affair lasted upwards of half an hour."

* Erskine, Vol. II. pp. 487-488.

Ibrahim first of all drove Adil down to Chunar; after this Sikander drove Ibrahim out of Agra and Delhi; but then Sikander's attention was called back to the Punjab which the Moghuls had invaded; and he had to return to that country. Ibrahim was thus enabled to return, but was defeated by Himu who shortly after also defeated the Bengal Army. But while all this internecine strife was wasting away the Afghan's strength, Humayun was preparing to re-conquer the Empire from which he had been driven. To him and his fortunes I now propose to return, it being remembered that when he came back to India, the Afghans were fighting confusedly amongst themselves and that Adil Shah who had the title of Padshah was not in possession of either Delhi or Agra and was indeed only lord of Behar.

---

CHAPTER XV.

WE left Humayun marching with a Persian force (A. D. 1545) to besiege Kandahar. This town was nominally a part of the Empire of Hindustan, its real master was Kamran. Humayun had a special motive for capturing this place, as his son and heir Akbar was there, he having been left behind in the flight to Persia and being at the time under the charge of the wife of his uncle Askari whom Kamran had appointed as Governor of that place. His mother had accompanied Humayun to Persia. On the Emperor's approach Akbar was sent to Kabul. The siege being protracted, Bairam Khan was sent to Kabul to negotiate with Kamran as to the place, and after staying there sometime Kamran sent him back with Khanzada Begam, Baber's favorite sister, to whom was confided the task of inducing Askari to surrender the fort to Humayun. This Askari finally did, induced more by the vigour of the siege than by his aunt's solicitations. The town was given up to the Persians according to Humayun's agreement with the Shah, but only for a time, for shortly after, on the death of the young Persian prince who was nominally in charge of the Persian Contingent, Humayun determined to seize the place and this he did by means of stratagem. From Kandahar Humayun set out for Kabul, and on the road was met by his brother Hindal who had escaped from there. Kamran finding that he was not in a position to fight allowed Humayun to take possession of Kabul in peace. There the latter recovered his son Akbar. The next few years of his life were spent in constant contests with his brother Kamran; in these Hindal was generally to be found on Humayun's side, Askari on Kamran's. No special interest connects itself with the details, and though we have the story at first hand from Jouhar the domestic, the latter's narrative is not to be compared with the vivid picture that makes Baber's memoirs such delightful reading. The most striking point in the narrative is that in one siege of Kabul—for Kabul was taken and re-taken more than once—Kamran exposed Akbar on the battlements so that the missiles of Humayun's force might possibly hit him. But the whole of Afghanistan is roamed over, at one time the story taking us beyond the Oxus to Badakshan, at another we being in the Indian low lands towards Peshawar or down to the South beyond Ghazni. Finally Hindal got killed on the field of battle, Askari was made a prisoner and sent to Mecca, from whence he never returned, and Kamran after being pardoned by Humayun time after time was eventually blinded by the latter's orders. He thereupon proceeded to Mecca. During his exile he died, A. D. 1557, four years after the time of his being thus blinded.

Humayun was now free to carry out his long cherished scheme of conquering India. Before doing so he determined to make sure of Bairam Khan who was Governor of Kandahar and who, he feared, would surrender that place to the Persian King. It must be remembered that Bairam was a Persian subject. So Humayun marched to Kandahar. On nearing that place Bairam Khan went out to meet him, entertained him magnificently and drove all suspicion out of his mind. Bairam Khan, indeed, asked as a special favour to be allowed to join the Indian Expedition—and so at the end of 1554 A. D. Humayun marched from Kabul with three thousand horses leaving Bairam to follow with the main body of his troops. Rhotas—the Punjab Rhotas—was found abandoned and Lahore was taken without a blow, Bairam, whose forces had marched further south in the meanwhile, was driving the Afghans before him everywhere. The Afghans, we are told, held the Moghuls in such terror that though they were thousands in number if they saw the approach of but half a score of big turbans (the Moghuls are so described on account of their head-dress), they instantly turned and took to flight without looking behind them. Bairam seems to have had considerable trouble in restraining his own troops; one of the leaders Tardi Beg in particular gave him much trouble. Hereafter we shall see how Bairam treated this man when he thought his folly had brought about defeat. At present, however, the Moghuls pushed on until they met the troops of Sikander Sur at Machiwara, 1555 A.D. These latter were attacked towards evening; the huts in which they lodged took fire; the flames by their light enabled the Moghuls to use their arrows with unerring aim (my readers will note the bow was at this time the favourite weapon for fighting at a distance) and the Afghans soon took flight. Humayun joined Bairam Khan and in a battle fought in June at Sirhind, totally defeated Sikander. The latter was forced to flee to the Siwaliks. There was now no foe between Humayun and Delhi and accordingly he re-entered Delhi in the month of July after an absence of fifteen years. The upper Gangetic Doab quickly surrendered to his arms and again he became Padshah of Delhi. His troops, thirsting for plunder, were, however, considerably out of hand and his first appointment of a Governor of Punjab seemed likely to wreck all his plans. For this position he had chosen Abdul Maali, a favourite of his own, head strong and presumptuous to a degree. Like Master, like troops. Anarchy again threatened. In order to remedy this, Humayun superseded Abdul Maali and appointed Prince Akbar as Governor of the Punjab. Bairam Khan became his Ataliq, (Governor) all power being centred in his hands. The result was fortunate; order was restored among the troops and when Abdul Maali attempted to show his presumption to Akbar, he was most effectively made to know his position. The Afghans had not yet been totally and finally defeated. More fighting was to come before the spoil would be divided; and it was well for the mercenary Moghuls that discipline should remain firm and unrelaxed. At this time Humayun met his death. The story is told how he was on the roof of his palace at the Dinpanah fort at Delhi, how he was descending therefrom when he heard the call for prayer, how thereupon he prepared to sit down till the call was over, but got tripped up by the skirt of his mantle and fell headlong on the floor below. The stairs are shown to the traveller till this day and nasty and narrow stairs they are. He was picked up insensible and after lingering a few days died on the 24th of January 1536. He left behind him an enemy still unsubdued, a minor son and a mercenary army. Fortunately for that son, unfortunately for the enemy, he also left behind him a strong man Bairam Khan equal both to the task of conquering the external enemy and restraining internal dissension and trouble.

Though strictly a part of the story of the reign of Akbar, here I may well tell of the end of the Sur Dynasty and the establishing of Akbar on the Delhi throne.

After his father's death, Akbar was duly proclaimed Padshah and placed on the Imperial throne at his camp at Kulanir in the Punjab. Humayun's death was concealed for several days at Delhi and it was only on the seventeenth day after that the Khutba was read in Akbar's name. In the meantime Himu was advancing from Behar with a great army and many elephants. Sikander Shah having fled to the Siwaliks and Ibrahim Shah to Malwa, both broken men without any considerable forces at their disposal, Adil Shah represented alone the Sur Dynasty. Pressing back the outlying Moghul forces, Himu soon reached Delhi. Here divided councils prevailed. Tardi Beg, the Governor, formerly so keen to fight, was now of opinion that the place should be abandoned, and that the Moghuls there should join Akbar in the Punjab. To this the other Moghuls did not agree. So South of Delhi a battle was fought (whether Tardi Beg and his troops joined or did not is uncertain), but anyhow a battle was fought in which Himu and his elephants were too strong for the Moghuls who had to abandon the Imperial City. One of the historians of that time suggests that there was an understanding between Himu and some of the Moghul chiefs; anyhow all was disorganisation amongst the latter's troops and they reached Akbar a beaten and divided force. Bairam's first step to restore order shows the determined character of the man. He put Tardi Beg to death. We are told that he did this without consulting Akbar in the matter, taking advantage of the latter's absence from the camp on a hunting expedition. Whether on this account or whether for other reasons the Moghul force which now advanced from the Punjab again became a disciplined army and not a disorderly rabble. Himu met them at Panipat. It is said that he had vowed to become a Mussulman previous to the battle at Delhi. If he had, he had not kept his vow. His dreams before the decisive fight were very unfavourable, but like other great men, however, he only trusted dreams when they promised fortune. On the other hand a Moghul madman skilled beyond all men in foretelling future events from the inspection of a blade bone of a sheep, a method of divination brought by the Moghuls from Central Asia, prophesied for the Moghuls a great victory in which, however, one of the chiefs of the army should fall. Three days previous to the fight Bairam is said to have addressed the Moghul troops thus : * “ This is the commencement of His Majesty’s reign. This infidel has routed the whole Royal army, and is now making preparations against us. If you do your best in this business, with one heart and soul, Hindustan is yours. I place my trust in God. If we fail in this, you, whose homes are at a distance of 500 kos, will not be able to find an asylum.”

He added to these exhortations gifts and promises of further gifts in the future, if successful. Full of enthusiasm the Moghuls entered into the fight. Himu, however, was full of fight too. First of all the battle went in his favour ; with his elephants and troops he pushed back the Moghul army, then while everything was going favourably, and he was leading successfully his troops on his elephant, an arrow struck him on the forehead. Sore-stricken he directed his elephant driver to take him out of the battle. He was captured, however, and brought to Bairam who put him to death. According to one account Bairam brought him bound to Akbar, and pointing out to him that it was his first success, told him to put the infidel to death with his own hand, which he did, thus acquiring the title of Ghazi. According to another account Akbar simply touched the wounded Himu with his sword. Anyhow Himu was killed and with him went the Empire of the Afghans. One Moghul chief, Abul Maali, was killed in the fight — not the former Governor of the Punjab who was in confinement at Lahore. So the historians say, was the madman’s prophecy fulfilled, and so ended the battle of Panipat which placed Akbar firmly on the Delhi throne. After this fight he recovered possession of the kingdom as held by Humayun at his death without any opposition.

The rest of the history of the Surs may be soon told. Adil Shah was not present at the battle of Panipat and maintained himself for some considerable time in Behar where he still held Chunar and Rhotas. At last he was defeated and killed in a fight with the King of Bengal. Sikander after being besieged by Akbar's forces in the fort of Mankot in the Punjab for six months surrendered, was allowed to go free and managed to reach Bengal. There he attempted to carve out a kingdom for himself but after some successes perished in fight; Ibrahim, who had fled to Malwa, left that country, and in some obscure fighting perished in Orissa. And so came the Sur family and with it Afghan ascendancy to an end. Still for some considerable time will we find Afghan chiefs reigning in Bengal, but all attempts to make the Delhi Padshahate an Afghan Empire disappeared and disappeared for ever. As far as Muhammedan might went, the ruling power, from the date of the second battle of Panipat, has ever been derived not from Afghanistan but from beyond, from Transoxiana and from the centres of the Turkish race in Central Asia.

* Elliott, Vol. V. p. 64.

CHAPTER XVI.

AKBAR.

AKBAR was 13 years old when he came to the throne. He reigned for nearly fifty years, dying in the year 1605 A. D. At his accession, although nominally the Padshah of Hindustan, the actual territory in his possession consisted of a small part of the Gangetic Doab (the land between the two rivers of Jumna and Ganges) and the greater part of the modern Punjab. His material strength lay in his twenty or thirty thousand Moghul troops. At the time of his death his rule either directly as Sovereign, or indirectly as Suzerain, extended from the Himalayas on the North to the Vindhya range on the South and from Western Afghanistan to Eastern Bengal. Throughout this enormous tract of country his will ran supreme. How this great change came about is the main subject of the following chapters, but before proceeding to details it may be as well to state briefly what in my opinion were the chief contributing causes to a change as wonderful as any that has been experienced in Indian History.

The first and chief cause was the state of the country itself and the peculiarities of its inhabitants. Hindus have always been more or less an easy prey to foreign invaders inasmuch as their bent of mind is essentially theoretical and not practical. It was about the time that Taimur invaded India during the period of decay of the earlier Muhammedan power that in Benares that wonderful system of legal ingenuity known as the Mitakshara, which governs Hindus in the greater part of India as regards property, and especially as regards the inheritance of property, was elaborated by the Pundits. Later on while the clash of arms was everywhere heard, in Bengal a further system of law, the Dayabhaga, saw the light whereby the rules of succession were based on the offering of funeral cakes to one's ancestors. This people ever busied itself with metaphysical and abstract speculation, most of them neither caring for nor excelling in arms. Leave us alone and we will leave you alone was their motto, and during the greater part of the Moghul rule the Hindu was left alone. As a cultivator he had to pay revenue to his Ruler; as a Kafir he might at times be exposed to indignity and occasionally to special taxation, but the Moghul rulers, as a rule, provided he paid taxes and did not disturb the peace, let him in other respects do what he pleased. So throughout Hindustan we find no popular Hindu risings against the Moghul ruler till the days of Aurungzeb towards the end of the seventeenth century when Muhammedan bigotry began to interfere with the exercise of the Hindu religion. As regards the Hindus of Rajputana, where Hindus were still Kings, there was absolutely no unity amongst the hundred and one princelets of that country. Rana Sanga had a long and uphill fight against rival Rajput chiefs before he was able to bring the united Rajput forces against Baber, and where Rana Sanga with great difficulties succeeded no Rajput of later days has done anything but fail; attempts at unity there have been, but these attempts have been ever feeble, and none have had even temporary success.

Turning away from the Hindus to the Muhammedans, who in those days were chiefly either Afghans or the descendants of Afghans, the latter with a large infusion of Hindu blood by reason of their having Hindu mothers being by far the more numerous, we find amongst these people too no elements capable of affording a successful resistance to a foe who knew his own mind and whose power was concentrated and united. Afghans, like the Cyclops of the old poet, lived, and loved to live, in isolated small clan communities without interference from others, each little clan being a complete kingdom in itself. In the story of Muhammedan Hindustan in the fifteenth century, we have already seen what an uphill battle against this centrifugal feeling had the rulers of that age to fight in order to bring about unity and how unity, even if attained for the moment, was quickly again shattered.

The so-called kingdoms were generally nothing more than the aggregates of smaller unities, which latter paid only a nominal subjection to the rulers who called themselves Kings. Sher Shah, a man of genius, was able indeed to join this loose community into one solid body, and having done so to expel the Moghuls, but after his death the old state of things set in, worse indeed than ever, and the Indian Muhammedans, instead of being one united community, were simply a large number of isolated groups. Accordingly neither Hindus nor Muhammedans were in a position to withstand the Moghul forces, provided that the latter were united amongst themselves and had a strong hand over them, preventing their disintegrating as the Afghans had done before. The fear of the Moghuls themselves splitting up, was by no means imaginary and the first few years of Akbar's reign was largely spent in repressing Moghul rebellion, but once this was done the rest of the work was comparatively simple. Given statesmanship, and this we will see Akbar and his Ministers had, which left the Hindus and Muhammedans alike alone, as far as it was compatible with the supremacy of the Moghul power, the physical force which Akbar had in his Moghul troops was more than sufficient to meet any foe whatever that came against him. Those that love analogies may find one in the British rule from 1750 to 1800 when it first became a power in India. This period may well be compared to Akbar's fifty years of rule. In both cases the conquerors took care not to offend the religious or social prejudices of the people and to leave them alone as far as possible, and in both cases they strove on the whole to introduce good and honest administration. A further resemblance may be found that neither invader had ever to war with more than a fractional part of the forces of the country at a time.

To the physical force wielded by Akbar and to the strength which his power acquired by sound administration must be added the moral strength of his position according to Eastern ideas in which legitimacy takes the highest place,—the fact that he was descended from the great Taimur and from Chinghiz Khan; these being to the Muhammedans of Asia what David and his line were to the devout Jew, names wherewith to conjure, though one of them was never a Muhammedan at all and the other's wars were chiefly with believers and not infidels.

---

CHAPTER XVII.

ONE of the great difficulties in judging the character of Akbar aright, is the amount of panegyric bestowed on him not only by Easterns such as Abul Fazl but also by Westerns. That he was the greatest of Indian Monarchs—one may well allow, that his life work, which was the establishment of Moghul rule as the settled rule for Hindustan and eventually for the greater part of the Deccan, was well done; that it was he, and he with comparatively small assistance, that caused this rule to become a real, powerful, far-reaching social administration, instead of simply a revenue-squeezing plundering system, such as is too commonly the case with the systems arising out of Eastern conquests; all this is perfectly true. But when it is put forward on his behalf that he was rather a demi-god than a mortal, that he was totally different from his contemporaries as regards moral and mental character, I am bound to note that this is hardly borne out by the facts. Akbar was essentially a man of his age. Like his father, still more like his grandfather, he had a great generous nature ; with a disposition ready ever to forgive, but this did not make him specially careful of human life. Pyramids of skulls were raised by his armies as they had been in Baber's reign and in the reigns of the great Moghul and Turkish conquerors before his enemies he put to death remorselessly, whether they were Hindu or Muhammedan ; he carried about poisonous pills to be administered to those whom he wished to secretly destroy, and all that can be said of him in this respect is that he was less cruel than any one of the other ruling Muhammedan princes of the day, from Constantinople and Cairo to remotest Bengal. As to his religious changes, these probably emanated in the first instance from his marriages with Rajput princesses, who, like the wives of Solomon, led him away from the teachings of his youth. In particular he was forced to leave the orthodox Sunni Jamaat (Sunni assembly) by the fact that he had more than four wives. A Muhammedan Sunni may have as many concubines as he wishes—the Sultan of Turkey indeed never marries but only has concubines—but of wives he may have only four at one time. At a very early age Akbar's wives exceeded this number, and whatever flattering Court Doctors might say, Akbar knew full well that to orthodox Sunni ideas his extra wives were but concubines. The Shiah claim the right to have as many temporary wives (Mutahis) as they wish ; and as their term may be anything from one hour to ninety-nine years, it is easy to see that their views on this all-important matter were the more pleasing to Akbar.* Hindus deify men even when living ; Oriental rule always tends to absolutism ; remember the Hindu wives and the absolutism of Akbar's rule and one can easily understand how he could fancy himself able to become if not a god, god's representative, even while living ; not waiting for death as a Roman Emperor did for his deification. As to his religious ideas and the toleration he had for all sects, it must be noticed that his toleration did not extend to the strictly orthodox of his ancestral religion ; I shall treat of this at some length thereafter ; at present I only say that most of his religious ideas can be explained by Hinduism and Sufi-ism, and that he fell under the influence of these two "isms" by reasons of political and domestic influences, as well as probably through the influence of a stronger thinking mind than his own.

---

* Note—Such wives however may not be idolators.

Akbar commenced his reign as a boy with Bairam Khan as his guardian ; harem influences seconded by Akbar himself put an end to Bairam Khan's rule ; then came a short period of harem rule ; then Akbar himself became master, and for years had to fight against rebel Moghuls and Afghans, chiefly the former, who wished that the new kingdom of Delhi should be what the old kingdom was, a kingdom with only a nominal head and with a feudal system in full force ; during the same time he had also one severe campaign against the Hindus, the campaign of Chitor. After these rebellions and this war was over, the boundaries of his kingdom gradually extended to the limits at which they stood, when he died ; but the greater and more important feature of the second and longer half of his reign was the organising of the Delhi Padshahate into the form it eventually took, a form which has been the frame of Indian Administration to this day and which the British have taken with but a minimum of change from their predecessors, the Moghul governors, whom they found in possession when they conquered India.

---

CHAPTER XVIII.

BAIRAM KHAN acted as Regent from 1556 to 1560 A.D. The chief wars in Hindustan which he waged during the minority of Akbar have already been described by me in accounting the events by which the various members of the Sur family were overthrown. He was a Persian and a Shiah. We find in him none of the open generosity which is so conspicuous a feature in the first three of the Moghul line. On the other hand he was possessed of a deep hatred towards Hindus and a sternness not to be distinguished from cruelty. By character he was eminently fitted to keep the Moghuls in hand, and so during the time that he ruled, although a minority is generally noted by the number of rebellions during its duration, revolts were but few and when they arose originated mainly from personal fear of his revenge. I have already related how he put Tardi Beg to death. He had also wished to slay Sheikh Abul Maali whom I have already named and who afterwards became a thorn in Akbar's side. As to this he was overridden by Akbar himself. His hand was everywhere felt, and as long as he held the reins of office so long men, even if they hated, feared him.

At the time of the death of Humayun, Mirza Sulaiman, a Tamurid, who was ruling in Badakshan as his vassal, on hearing of his overlord's death, marched and besieged Kabul, which had been left by Humayun in the care of Munim Khan. The siege, however, came to nothing, and Akbar's younger brother, Mirza Mohamed Hakim, who had been left in the charge of Munim Khan, was formally declared Viceroy. This position he held with hardly a break until his death nearly 30 years afterwards. During this period he was one of the most troublesome of Akbar's Viceroys though he was ever forgiven, as sprung from a common father. Humayun's ladies who had also been left at Kabul, after his death, were removed to Hindustan. With them came both Akbar's mother and also Akbar's two foster-mothers; the latter were named Jiji Anagah and Mahum Anagah. Jiji Anagah's husband Shamsuddin will appear later on as a man of mark. These three ladies had great influence over the young ruler; the children of the foster-mothers were known as Kokahs, and we shall find them playing a conspicuous part in the history of the time.

Bairam Khan's official title was Khan-Khanan, the Khan of Khans. One of his chief favourites was the Sunni Mullah Pir Muhammad. According to Nizamuddin this man from small origins became Bairam Khan's general Manager; consequently all the business of the State passed through his hands. Such a rise in position caused him to become so inflated with pride that he thought himself equal, if not superior, to his own benefactor. The story goes that Bairam Khan went once to call upon him, taking him to be sick inasmuch as he had absented himself from his service. On arrival at Pir Muhammad's mansion, a slave of the latter told Bairam to wait until his arrival was announced to the Pir. This naturally enraged Bairam Khan; and though on appearing Pir Muhammad excused the slave on the ground that he did not know Bairam Khan, still all the same the Pir did not allow Bairam Khan's retinue to attend him within the house. The latter said nothing at the time, but shortly after sent Pir Muhammad Khan this message: * "Formerly, you were a poor student, and came to Kandahar in a needy, forlorn condition; but I perceived some signs of excellence in you, and remembered some old services. I therefore advanced you to the dignity of Khan and Sultan. But your nature is unable to bear this great advancement, and the bad points in your character get the mastery of you. I, therefore, think it advisable to deprive you for a time of Royal distinctions and dignity so that you may come to your proper sense. You must return your banner, kettle-drum, and all other marks of honour."

Shortly after the Pir was made a prisoner and forcibly sent on a pilgrimage to Mecca. He had, however, got no further than Gujarat, than Bairam Khan fell from power and consequently instead of completing his pilgrimage returned to Court. Various stories are told of Bairam Khan's irritability in his days of power. On one occasion two elephants were brought out to fight, while the army was in camp. The animals in their struggle approached near the tent of Bairam Khan where he was lying ill with boils; on this he suspected that the Royal servants had planned an insult to him. Accordingly he sent to enquire from the Emperor what fault had been imputed to him that he should be subjected to this mark of Royal displeasure. On another occasion a Royal elephant having maimed one of his own he had the driver of the former put to death. On a third occasion a must (mad) elephant belonging to the Emperor getting loose rushed into the Jumna and endangered his life. Akbar sent him the driver bound, and in spite of the fact that the driver had by his exertions in all probability saved Bairam's life, the latter put him to death. The end of all this was that Akbar, goaded doubtless by the members of his father's harem, got thoroughly tired of Bairam Khan and determined to take the rule into his own hands. Bairam's rule had indeed been successful. There was little or no internal trouble. Gwalior had been retaken and on the Eastern side of the Ganges, Jaunpur, the capital of the old Eastern Kingdom, had again fallen into Moghul hands, but still in such matters as the change of rulers in the East the prosperity of kingdoms counts but little in comparison with the intrigues of women and princes. It has been suggested that if Bairam Khan had known what was coming he would have got rid of Akbar and put some other Taimurid on the throne, but it is also quite possible that his strong personal feeling towards Humayun would have prevented him following such a course. Anyhow Akbar did not give him a chance. On the pretence of hunting he left Agra and when half-way to Delhi, received, doubtless in pursuance of a pre-arranged plan, intimation to the effect that his mother who resided at Delhi was ill, and wished to see him. Consequently he proceeded to that place. When there, his foster-mothers as well as Shamsuddin pressed him to get rid of Bairam Khan. Probably but little pressure was necessary. Announcement was speedily made that Akbar had taken the affairs of the State into his own charge and that all orders in future should emanate from him. Bairam had long expressed, as Muhammedans very commonly do, without over much attention of carrying out the same, a desire to visit the holy places of Arabia. Consequently Akbar sent him this message :

* Elliot, Vol. V, p. 218.

“As I was fully assured of your honesty and fidelity, I left all important affairs of State in your charge and thought only of my own pleasures. I have now determined to take the reins of Government into my own hands, and it is desirable that you should now make the pilgrimage to Mecca upon which you have been so long intent. A suitable jagir out of the parganas of Hindustan shall be assigned for your maintenance, the revenues of which shall be transmitted to you by your agents.”

Bairam accepted his dismissal in good grace, and having left Agra proceeded West seemingly on his way to Mecca. From Nagor he returned his banner, kettledrums and other marks of honour to the Emperor. When proceeding further West he found that the Hindu Rajas barred his way. His old protégé and present enemy Pir Muhammad who had only reached Gujarat on his way to Mecca returned to Court, was given the title of Khan and sent to expedite Bairam's movements. The latter, probably justly, considered that this step indicated the determination of his enemies about the Court to absolutely ruin him. Consequently he broke out into revolt and turning North marched into the Punjab. He was, however, unsuccessful and after some fighting was driven into the Lower Himalayas. A story is told by Nizamuddin which puts Bairam's character in a very favourable light.

*"A party of adventurous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword. Sultan Husain Jalair was killed in the action. When they brought his head into the presence of the Khan-Khanan, in a burst of feeling he exclaimed: 'This life of mine is not worth so much, that a man like this should be killed in my defence.'"

Bairam Khan now threw himself on the mercy of the Emperor. This was granted, and he was again permitted to go to Mecca. This time, however, he travelled with a very different following. He never got further than Gujarat, for when at Pattan, one of the chief towns of that State, he was stabbed by an Afghan whose father had either been killed in action with the Moghuls or had been put to death by Bairam's orders. Afghan vendettas rival those of Corsica. With his death Akbar was freed from the apprehension that the elder soldiers of his father Humayun would rule in future in his name. Henceforth he became his own first minister, and though in the coming years rebellions were many and intrigues numerous, still Akbar was always the centre pivot around which the Moghul destinies hung. He and he only was the real ruler of the Delhi State.

* Elliott, Vol. V, 267.

Akbar was still in his teens when Bairam Khan fell from power. For the next three years the chief influence in the State was Mahum Anagah, one of his foster-mothers. Like harem influence in general, her influence was bad. Adham Khan, her son, was pushed by her into a place of power which he never should have held and the result was tragic. First of all he was sent with an army against Baz Bahadur Khan of Malwa, accompanied by Pir Muhammad, who held the position of second in command. This man is thus described by Abdul Kadir—better known as Budaoni, about whom I shall have plenty to say hereafter and who certainly had no objection to theologians, as cruel, insolent, severe. He remarks that as to him the old saying was verified that "He who seeks learning in scholastic theology is an infidel, and the doctors of scholastic theology are infidels to whatever sect they belong; we flee to God for a refuge from a knowledge which doth not profit, from a prayer that is not heard, from a heart that is not humble and a body that is not satisfied." Baz Bahadur was noted even amongst Oriental sensualists for his sensuality. Prime among his harem favourites was Rupmati—a Hindu woman. A short fight decided the struggle. Baz Bahadur fled to Gujarat. A number of his women were slain by their attendants to prevent their falling into Adham Khan's hands, but the larger part of his harem was captured. Rupmati to prevent herself from becoming the concubine to any fresh master, took poison after her capture. The conquerors practised the most horrible cruelties not only towards the soldiers of Baz Bahadur but to the people of Malwa generally. On the day of the battle, in the graphic words of Budaoni, the two captains remained on the spot, and had the captives brought before them, and troop after troop of them put to death, so that their blood flowed river upon river; and Pir Muhammad Khan, with a smile on his face, said in jest "what a plague of a strong neck this victim has, and what a power of blood has poured from it." He adds: "And as for God's creation (which is only another term for mankind), with my own eye was it seen, that in his sight it was valued but as radishes, and cucumbers and leeks." When I, without any prejudice against either side, came to that army and saw the terror, like that of the judgment day, I said to my friend Mihr Ali Khan Beg Sildoz, "Though the rebels have met with their deserts yet it is not at all in accordance with the sacred law to kill and imprison their wives and children. Then he, on account of the pain offered to his religious feelings and conscience, spoke to Pir Muhammad Khan to the same effect. He replied "In one single night all these captives have been taken, what can be done with them." And further on we read: "And the Sayyids and Sheikhs of that place came out to meet him with their Korans in their hands, but Pir Muhammad Khan put them all to death, and burnt them."

Shortly after when Pir Muhammad was in sole command, Baz Bahadur returned from Gujarat and attacked him. Retreating to Mandu, he was drowned in the Nerbudda, and so, as the historian says, went by water to fire. The sighs of the orphans and weak and captives, we are told, were his ruin. Oriental history is full to overflowing with conquerors of the sort, and if the sighs of those whom they had bereaved and robbed, were their ruin, few would have a long career. In the West, too, some of our best known historical characters would have had but short shift in such cases. Few of the smaller Indian tyrants however have a worse record than this Pir Muhammad.

To return to Adham Khan, this young man full of presumption on account of his being the son of Mahum Anagah, only forwarded to Akbar a small part of the booty taken by him in his successful expedition. This booty largely consisted in women, the special perquisite of an Eastern Monarch. Akbar on this account as well as on account of the various stories that were afloat as to Adham Khan's behaviour in Malwa determined to march and meet him. His mother Mahum Anagah sent him word of Akbar's intention, but nevertheless he was taken unawares with the whole of the booty in his camp. Though justly incensed Akbar pardoned him, he handing over the spoils to the Emperor. On the latter's returning towards Delhi, Adham Khan managed to abduct from the harem two beautiful girls—part of the Malwa spoils. Akbar learnt of this, had them pursued and brought back. They were confided to Mahum Anagah's care, and she to prevent Akbar from learning the truth from their lips, had them put to death. Murders in Indian harems were common enough, but few stand out as so heartless as this. Neither man nor woman in these days had amongst the grandees of Hindustan the slightest respect for human life. Adham Khan was again pardoned by the Emperor; but his end was near. The man whom he specially hated and dreaded was Shamsuddin, the husband of Akbar's second foster-mother. Breaking into the Imperial audience chamber at Agra at the head of a band of associates, Adham Khan stabbed Shamsuddin in the breast. The wounded man tried to flee, but was cut down. Seated along with Shamsuddin were Munim Khan, Shitabuddin and others. These did nothing to protect the wounded man and indeed were suspected of having incited Adham Khan to the crime. What followed is thus told by Budaoni "Then with his sword in his hand he (Adham Khan) swaggered in, and took his stand at the door of the Royal inner apartments." Then the Emperor also seized a sword, and coming out, asked him, "Why did you commit such an act?" He answered, "A disloyal fellow has met with his deserts." Then they bound him hand and foot, and cast him down from the top of the terrace of the palace, and since he still breathed the Emperor commanded them to throw him down a second time. According to other accounts Adham Khan besought pardon, but Akbar struck him with his fist such a blow that he fell senseless; after this he was thrown over the battlements. His mother only survived her son forty days. They both lie buried under an enormous dome which bears the name of Adham Khan's tomb, some miles out of Delhi close to the Kuth Monument. Of the many heroes of Akbar's age but few have left monuments behind them. This worthless fellow has perhaps the noblest monument of them all.

---

CHAPTER XX.

AFTER the death of Mahum Anagah Akbar stood forth as Emperor himself. Hereafter he may have many Ministers ; he himself is always master. In the next few years the guiding principles of his long reign seem to have been worked out in his mind. Most striking to a Western is the fact that they seem to have sprung so quick into full life. Every thing in the East ripens fast ; minds as well as plants. Before he is five and twenty Akbar shows his intention not to be a Muhammedan overlord, but the Ruler and Master of both Muhammedan and Hindu alike. No longer, as under former rulers and under none more than Bairam Khan, are the Hindus a despised section of the community left to go their own way, save when money is wanted from them. Now at last they are brought within the scope of the Imperial policy. Such principles could not come into practice without much discontent on the part of the Muhammedan community particularly on the part of the foreign Moghuls ; and hence we shall find rebellions repeatedly through the reign, sometimes indeed the rebellion of near relations, who have personal motives of ambition for their action, but oftener of leaders of the Moghul aristocracy who desired to bring back a feudal system, in which the part of the hewers of wood and drawers of water was to be taken by the Hindus and the higher grades of the feudal body by Muhammedans.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE murder of Shamsuddin and the slaying of his murderer by Akbar seemed likely to cause the greatest commotion. Munim Khan and other grandees conscious of the guilt of having instigated Adham Khan fled. The Atkah Khail (the clan of the foster-brothers) as Shamsuddin's relations were called, fearing a revolution, flew to arms. But here Akbar's good sense stood him in good part. The deed had been done and his policy was to cover the past with oblivion. Munim Khan and others were pardoned; the former returned after some interval to Court where he is to be found again as one of the most sagacious of Akbar's Counsellors. The Atkah Khail's arms were diverted from attacking Adham Khan's fellow conspirators by being sent into the country of the Gakkars. This tribe of robbers whom I have already mentioned had preferred a doubtful allegiance to Akbar, but objected to his granting a chief of theirs Kamal Khan whom Selim Khan had once tried to blow up in Gwalior Fort by gunpowder and who afterwards had been granted a Jagir in Hindustan, a half share of the rule of their land. Adham Khan, who was the actual chief at the time, took up arms. Fighting, in which the Atkah Khail took a prominent part, followed, but the Gakkars were no match for the Imperial troops. Kamal Khan became sole ruler; Adham Khan was made his prisoner and remained so until his death.

CHAPTER XXII.

Twice in this part of the reign was his life threatened. A Taimurid Mirza Sharafuddin had found favour in the Imperial Court through Mahum Anagah. Owing to some imaginary grievances he fled from there, leaving behind a slave whom he commissioned to murder Akbar. An attempt was accordingly made by him on Akbar's life. As the latter was passing through a bazaar the slave shot at him with an arrow from the roof of the college of Mahum Anagah. The Emperor was struck, but the injury was slight. Soon after Akbar was very nearly slain by one of the house slaves of Khwajah Muazzam. This man was his maternal uncle. His wife who came from the Harem of Humayun was constantly maltreated by him and when Akbar paid him a visit in order to compose differences between husband and wife, the Khwajah in a fit of passion stabbed the woman mortally and flung the bloody knife into the courtyard amongst the Royal retinue. Akbar enraged, attempted to enter the house and would have been, had it not been for the bystanders who interfered, cut down on his entry by the Khwajah's slaves

The punishment was immediate. At Akbar's order the Khwajah was well thrashed and thrown into the river Jumna, bound hand and foot. It is said that although he was submerged several times, he would not drown, and that whenever he rose to the surface he abused the Emperor. In any case he was sent a prisoner to Gwalior where he died insane.

I have already spoken of Mirza Sharafuddin. Numerous Taimurids came in the train of Humayun and Akbar to India. Each of these men considered himself equal in every respect to the reigning Emperor and consequently throughout a great part of the reign of Akbar we have them incessantly rebelling. Their ordinary appellation in Indian History is the Mirzas. The first of these rebels was Sharafuddin. He allied himself to Abul Maali. They tried to raise the Punjab where, in spite of a success obtained by treachery, they failed to hold their own. Abul Maali escaped to Kabul. Sharafuddin himself went South where he joined himself thereafter to other of the Mirzas. When Abul Maali reached Kabul he found Muhammad Hakim, Akbar's brother, the nominal ruler there, but his mother, Mah Begum, the real ruler. Akbar's nominee, Ghani Khan, had been turned by this lady out of Kabul; to replace him Munim Khan was sent with an army. This nobleman trusted much to the fact that he had formerly been Viceregent at Kabul; consequently he did not take with him a sufficient force. His trust proved to be based on no solid ground, and he was forced to return. Abul Maali, who had helped the Begum to dispose of all rivals to her rule of Kabul, had married her daughter; he then turning against her stabbed her with his own hand. His own ruin did not tarry long. Mirza Sulaiman, ruler of Badakshan, whose wife Khurram Begum was one of the most masterful characters of the age, marched from his mountains nominally to free Mirza Muhammad Hakim from Abul Maali's yoke, really to bring the young Mirza under his own control. Abul Maali met him in battle, but his troops deserted him and he himself had to flee. On being taken prisoner he was handed over to the young Mirza who had him strangled A.D. 1563. Mirza Sulaiman did not retain Kabul long. Muhammad Hakim escaped from his control and, coming as far as Peshawar, begged for Akbar's assistance ; this was promptly given. Jelalabad was stormed by the Imperial army, and Mirza Sulaiman without any further struggle fled to Badakshan. A nobleman whose real name was Muhammad Kuli and titular name Khan Kalan (the great Khan) was left as the young Mirza's guardian, but the latter chafed under his yoke and shortly after the Khan Kalan returned to India. These events took place in A.D. 1563-1564.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE rebellions I have mentioned occurred in the West and were more or less caused by members of the Royal family. The next took place in the East and originated in members of the Moghul aristocracy who objected to the centralised Government which Akbar seemed determined to institute. The leaders of this rebellion considered themselves every bit as good as Akbar himself. Their desire was to establish the old state of things whereby the ruler at Delhi's real power extended but little way from Head-Quarters and where every local chief was practically an absolute ruler within his own Jagir or Sarkar.

The head and brain of these rebellious feudatories was an Uzbek Ali Kuli Khan, commonly known by his title Khan Zaman. He had been a chief officer of Humayun in his Afghan campaigns and to him chiefly was ascribed the victory at Paniput. In the time of Bairam's regency he had caused troubles in Court by a scandalous love affair and had incurred the enmity of the all-powerful Pir Muhammad. Originally holding the Jagir of Sambhal (Rohilkund) he was transferred from there by this man's influence and entrusted with the charge of a campaign against the ever-rebellious Afghans of Jaunpur and Behar. This he successfully carried through, and until his death his was the real power in these provinces. United with him in the revolt were his brother Bahadur, his cousin Sikander and his uncle Ibrahim. It is said that the reason why they rebelled was the treatment Akbar meted out to Abdullah, an Uzbek General, and a relation of theirs in Malwa. The latter refused or neglected to send to Akbar spoil taken by him; thereupon the Emperor marched against him, drove him into Gujarat, and by threatening Chenghiz Khan, the then King of that country, had him driven out from there. Coming to Behar he stirred up a revolt. But without his coming, it would have had to come. A centralised rule as Akbar desired, and a feudal aristocracy such as that of which Khan Zaman was the representative could not co-exist. European history is full of similar instances. The actual uprising arose this way. Akbar sent his Mir Munshi (Chief Secretary) to bring Sikander to Court. The latter who was at Ajodhya took the Mir Munshi first to his uncle Ibrahim and then to Khan Zaman at Jaunpur. There it was resolved to hold the Minister as a hostage and to openly revolt. To quell this, Munim Khan was sent, Akbar following and joining him. When the Royal troops reached Lucknow, Sikander fled. Nor was any stand made at Jaunpur. Through the intercession of Munim Khan, the rebels prayed for submission. Khan Zaman's mother and Ibrahim personally visited the Royal camp and besought pardon. To Munim Khan, who reminded Akbar of Khan Zaman's services in the past, the latter is reported to have said: "For your sake, I forgive their offences; but I am not satisfied that they will remain faithful." Left in possession of their old Jagirs, they soon justified Akbar's forebodings by again breaking into revolt. To this they were encouraged by a victorious fight that Bahadur, Khan Zaman's brother, had with the Royal Generals near Allahabad. Bahadur was the most discontented of the family. On suggesting an accommodation with Muiz-ul-Mulk, the Royal General, the latter refused to come to any settlement. The sword, he said, must be the arbitrator. Budaoni tells us Muiz-ul-Mulk was all fire and flame and Raja Todar Mul poured on oil and naphtha. We shall meet this Raja, the greatest of all Akbar's ministers, again. His first essay at fighting was not successful. The Royal troops were badly beaten. Into the details of the rebellion or rather rebellions—for there were more than one, their course being reconciliation, pardon and then a fresh outburst—I need not enter. The rebels were aided by the fact that for a considerable time Akbar's attention was turned towards Kabul. They read the Khutbah in Mirza Muhammad Hakim's name, though they had as little intention of obeying him as of obeying Akbar. One curious story deserves telling. Asaf Khan, one of the Royal Generals, fell under Akbar's suspicion and fled to his brother, Vazir Khan, one of the rebels with Khan Zaman. He soon repented his choice. His subsequent adventures are thus told by Nizam Uddin.

*“Khan Zaman sent Asaf Khan along with Bahadur Khan to seize upon some territories which were in the hands of the Afghans; but he kept Vazir Khan near himself, and appointed men to watch him. Vazir Khan sent a person to Asaf Khan to say—‘I intend to fly from this place at such and such a time; do you also in some way or other get away from Bahadur Khan.’ Asaf Khan accordingly, leaving all his baggage and property behind, went off in the night, and took the road to Karra-Manikpur. In the course of the night he travelled thirty kos, but Bahadur Shah pursued him, and overtook him between Jaunpur and Manikpur. A fight ensued, in which Asaf Khan was defeated and taken prisoner. Bahadur Khan threw him into a howda on an elephant and went on his way, when Vazir Khan, who had got away from Khan Zaman, came up. Bahadur Khan, feeling that he was unable to cope with Vazir Khan, gave orders for putting Asaf Khan to death at once in the howda. Sword-cuts were aimed at Asaf Khan, three of his fingers were cut off, and he received a wound also in the nose; but Vazir Khan fought his way through, and rescued his brother. The two brothers then went to Karra, and Bahadur Khan returned without accomplishing his object. Vazir Khan proceeded to Court, and, through the intervention of Muzaffar Khan, he was admitted to an audience, and received pardon for his own and his brother's offences, while His Majesty was near Lahore, engaged in the pursuit of Mirza Muhammad Hakim and in hunting. A farman of favour and conciliation was sent to Asaf Khan.”

* Elliott, Vol. V. pp. 309-10.

The whole time taken up by these revolts was over two years from early in A.D. 1565 to A.D. 1567. In June of the latter year the end came; Akbar in that month met the rebels in battle near the Ferry at Manikpur not far from Allahabad. Bahadur was wounded, taken prisoner and brought before Akbar, who ordered him to be kept safely by his Amirs. These, without waiting for further orders, put him to death. Khan Zaman being wounded was trampled under foot by an elephant. A soldier passing by struck off his head and brought it to Akbar. We are told that it was recognised by the teeth on the right side being black. A eunuch, once in Khan Zaman's service, stated that he always chewed betel-nut with these teeth and that consequently he could be identified by their being black. I am afraid this was but a poor test. Anyhow he never appeared again. Akbar had both Bahadur's and Khan Zaman's heads stuffed and sent to Agra. Sikander escaped and was not followed. A number of prisoners were trodden to death under elephants at Jaunpur. On the whole the revolt was put down without an excess of cruelty; compared to the bloody way risings in Europe at the time, take the Peasant's war for instance, were dealt with, Akbar's panegyrists may well praise his clemency. Never again did Akbar have to meet such a dangerous opposition from his own Moghuls. Subsequent revolts were both less obstinate and in later years the material forces which he had to meet them were much greater.

---

CHAPTER XXIV.

WHETHER Akbar had previously to the outbreak of these revolts worked out the general principles on which his rule should rest, is a matter of inference. At any rate before they were put down he seems to have firmly grasped the general rules, by which in future life he was guided. He was not to be the first of the Moghuls but the King of Hindustan. His Hindu subjects were far greater in number than his Muhammedan. Besides the Hindus in his own territories there existed the races of Rajputana, then as ever in Muhammedan times more or less free, possessing some of the highest qualities of chevaliers and warriors. And it was not so much through the Hindus in general as through the Rajputs in particular, that he determined to be master in Hindustan of Moslem and Hindu alike. To the Rajput Prince, who threw in his fortunes with his, he offered everything the Empire could give, wealth, power, commands. The essence of such a union was through marriage. A Hindu by the laws of his religion cannot marry save a Hindu of his own caste. A Muhammedan is not bound by any such restriction. But even he cannot according to the law marry an idolatress. To avoid this there is generally a nominal conversion of the bride. But Akbar does not seem to have had resort to any such artifice. Afterwards we shall learn how he arrogated to himself pontifical powers as regards religion. At present it is sufficient to say that he married Hindu wife after Hindu wife. These marriages were the real foundation of all Akbar's policy. By them he pledged himself to tolerance, for he needed tolerance from his co-religionists, to relying on Rajput support against orthodox Islam and to the maintenance of the dignity of Rajput princes. But some of these latter were as conservative and unbending as any of the Ulema in Akbar's Court. For them, there was nothing to expect from Akbar but incessant war. Soon after that Khan Zaman was trodden under foot by an elephant,—we shall read of a storm and sack of Chitor as bloody and terrible as that by Baz Bahadur of Gujarat in the early days of Humayun's reign.

---

CHAPTER XXV.

BEHARI MUL, the Kuchwaha of Amber near which stands modern Jaipur, was the first Rajput Prince to enter into a matrimonial alliance with Akbar. His daughter was the first Rajput of Royal birth to enter as a wife into a Moghul Emperor's Harem. He had been a friend of Humayun's before the latter's flight to Persia, and after the battle of Paniput was invited to the Royal Court. While there Akbar, then a boy under the tutelage of Bairam Khan, had the unpleasant experience of being run away with by a wild elephant, but to his surprise Behari Mul's Rajput attendants were the only people about who did not give way to the infuriated beast. In 1561 A.D. Akbar went in pilgrimage to the tomb of the famous Chisti Saint at Ajmere. Negotiations were entered into between him and Behari Mul's family which ended in the latter visiting the Royal Court at Sunkanir and in his giving his daughter in marriage to the Emperor. Akbar's successor Jehangir was the offspring of this union.

The Amber family were but minor rulers in Rajasthan. The foremost Rajput family was that of the Sesodias of Chitor. Its boast was that it had ever kept the flag flying, that it had never yielded to Moslem, though its country had again and again been overrun and its capital, once in the early part of the fourteenth century and once by Baz Bahadur, been taken by storm. Break them the Muhammedans might, bend them they could not. Their country, largely hilly, for the Aravali hills were a part of their domain, afforded peculiar facilities for a guerilla war. Army after army might march through and plunder their country; with their withdrawal the Rajput came out of his hiding places and again took possession of the soil. The Chief of the Sesodias at the time was Rana Udai Sing, and he was alas a coward. Tod moralises on the comparison between his character and Akbar's. But no hero, even of the stature of Leonidas, could have saved the Sesodia capital. Excuses for the invasion were easily found—are indeed always easily found by a big state envying a smaller one.

It was suggested that the Chitor rulers had aided with some of Akbar's fugitive subjects. Anyhow Akbar with a large force marched to Chitor and laid formal siege to the place. Rajput annals tell of a prior siege by Akbar which was unsuccessful, but of this the Muhammedan historians record nothing. Scarcely had Akbar commenced the siege than Rana Udai Sing, the opprobrium of the Sesodia race, quitted the town. Behind him, however, he left many a gallant Rajput determined to live and die for beloved Chitor. We have the story of the siege told us by Muhammedan historians and Rajput annalists, naturally from very different points of view, the one telling us the story from without and the other from within. Chitor itself is a fortress capable of a stout defence. A lonely height it stands out away from the other hills around, with a base circumference of eight miles and an elevation of some 500 feet, the fort itself standing on the crest, like an eagle's eyrie. Like most of such fortresses it has its drawbacks. On the Southern side the rock is so narrow as to be embraced by an immense half moon commanding the hill, called Chitoree not more than 150 yards distant from the main fort. This, when once captured, affords a favourable starting point for a final assault.

At the beginning of the cold weather A.D. 1567, the Moghuls began the siege; its first day was one of lightning and thunder, of storm and rain; it seemed as if the old elemental gods of Rajputana had come to battle on behalf of their worshippers against the new and more powerful god of the Moslems. Rajput chief after Rajput chief died in the defence. Like to the Highland champions of the Clan Kay on the fatal day in the North Inch; one dying, another took his place, the cry being ever one more for Hector; but the Hector of Chitor like the Hector of the Clan Kay being a dastard had escaped from the fatal fray. We are told in particular of one Rajput champion Patta of Kailwa. * "He was only sixteen: his father had fallen in the last shock, and his mother had survived but to rear him the sole heir of their house. Like the Spartan mother of old, she commanded him to put on the saffron robe and to die for Chitor: but surpassing the Grecian dame, she illustrated her precept by example; and lest any soft compunctious visitings, for one dearer than herself might dim the lustre of Kailwa, she armed the young bride with a lance, with her descended the rock, and the defenders of Chitor saw her fall, fighting by the side of her Amazonian mother."

On the one side the most desperate courage, on the other side cool calculating generalship. The siege was conducted by the * Tod, Rajasthan, Vol. I, p. 275.

Moghuls by regular approaches, constructions of mounds called Sabats were thrown up and mines dug in the most improved fashion then known. In this way little by little the Moghuls pushed to the foot of the walls. When the first mine exploded, one of the bastions of Chitor was blown into the air and a breach effected, but the storming party rushing in, a second mine exploding blew up Moghuls and Rajputs alike. Large numbers on both sides perished. New mines and Sabats were constructed. The Muhammedan historian tells us how on the last night of the siege the Emperor, who was seated in a gallery which had been erected for him, fired with his own hand at Jaimul, chief of the Rajputs, and shot him dead; shortly after the storm began. Nizamuddin tells us that on the death of Jaimul, the Rajputs were dispirited and so killed their wives and children according to the Jauhar right and then proceeded to meet their foe. He adds—*“All that night the fighting went on, but in the morning, which was a glorious morning, the place was subdued. The Emperor mounted on an elephant, and attended by his devoted followers on foot, entered the fortress. An order for a general massacre was issued, and more than 8,000 Rajputs who were in the place received the reward of their deeds.” Much to be preferred is the complexion put on the dreadful story by Rajput authorities. They on their side relate how the 8,000 Rajputs ate the last betel-nut together and put on their saffron robes, indicative of their intention to die for their country and their gods, how after the Jauhar was completed, the gates were thrown open, the Rajput warriors rushed forth and few survived “to stain the yellow mantle” in inglorious surrender. Three thousand inhabitants of Chitor became victims to Akbar’s thirst for conquest. The victory was complete; the temples and the palaces were thrown down and the place was left a desert. We are told later on, probably when Akbar knew more thoroughly the Rajput, that he erected gigantic statues of Jaimul and Patta, two of the chief defendants of Chitor at the most conspicuous entry to his palace at

---

* Elliott, Vol. V, 328.

Delhi. But though Chitor was taken, the Sesodias were not subdued, and throughout the reign they carried on a desultory warfare without, however, much result. Again in later reigns they will come to the front.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THOUGH I am now proceeding out of chronological order, I might mention here the only remaining important contest that Akbar's troops had with Hindus during the rest of his reign. Before doing so, I should mention, however, a fight at Thanesar between the Hindu sects in which the Emperor took the part of a pleased spectator. I quote from Nizamuddin—"When the Emperor arrived at Thanesar, there was an assemblage of Jogis and Sannyasis on the banks of a lake called Kurhet. This is a sacred place of the Brahmans, and on occasion of eclipses, the people of Hindustan flock thither from all parts to bathe. There was a great assemblage there on this occasion, and the people were bestowing their gifts of gold and silver, and jewels and stuffs, upon the Brahmans. Many of them threw themselves into the water and the Jogis and Sannyasis were gathering a rich harvest from their charity. In consequence of a feud which existed between the sects, they came to the Emperor seeking permission to settle it by fighting. Sannyasis were between two and three hundred in number, and the Jogis, who wear only rags, were over 500. When the adversaries stood ready to begin the fray, by the Emperor's order, some soldiers smeared their persons with ashes, and went to support the Sannyasis, who were the weaker party. A fierce fight ensued and many were killed. The Emperor greatly enjoyed the sight. At length the Jogis were defeated, and the Sannyasis were the victors."

On other occasions we find Hindu fanatics devoting themselves to death and rushing on the Royal troops. Akbar had also shortly after the taking of Chitor to besiege both Rantambhor and Kalinjar, two of the strongest fortresses in Rajputana and famed in times past for their stout defence against the Muhammedans. In each case the fortresses, Rantanbhor in the year 1569 A.D., and Kalinjar in 1570 A.D., surrendered shortly after they had been invested. His troops also in 1573 A.D. besieged Nagarkot, which was held by a Hindu Princelet in the Lower Himalayas. Fighting there seems to have been at this place and of a most desperate nature. Nizamuddin describes most graphically the difficulties of the expedition. He tells us how the army had to go through a thickly wooded country which was difficult even for an ant or a snake to creep. When Nagarkot was reached, an outlying fortress had to be stormed in which were a party of the Rajputs who fought until the last man. He tells us that a number of cows had taken refuge in the temple and that the savage Turks, so he calls Akbar's troops, slew these cows all one by one. They then all took off their boots and filled them with blood, and cast it upon the roof and walls of the temple.

The siege of Nagarkot was carried on by regular circumvallation. Nizamuddin tells us how a ball fired from a cannon killed nearly 80 people. The place, however, was not to be taken. I turn to Nizamuddin for the rest of the story. * "The army was suffering great hardships, and the dogs in the fortress were anxious for peace, so Husain Kuli Khan felt constrained to accede. The infidels undertook to pay a large tribute; five mans of gold, Akbarshahi weight, and various kinds of stuffs for His Majesty. A mosque was founded in front of the palace of Raja Jai Chandar, and after the completion of the first arch a pulpit was raised, and Hafiz Muhammad Bakar read the Khutbah in the name of the Emperor on Friday, in the middle of Shawal, 980. As he repeated the titles of the Emperor, gold was showered upon his head. When peace was concluded, the Khutbah read, and the coins stamped with the Emperor's name. Husain Kuli Khan (the Commander of the Royal troops) marched away."

The only severe campaign after this against a Hindu chief was in A.D. 1577 against Rana Kika. It was conducted on the

* Elliott, Vol. V, p. 358.

Imperial side by Man Sing, son of Bhagwan Das, and grandson of Behari Mul of Amber. Man Sing by this date had become one of Akbar's greatest Generals. The campaign was in Western Rajputana, and we are fortunate in having an account given us of it by Budaoni one of the most remarkable characters in Akbar's Court. This man whom I shall describe afterwards was a Muhammedan of the most orthodox type, hating Shiah and Hindus alike, whose personal needs alone caused him to hang on to Akbar's Court, where he ever saw what displeased his orthodox eye. His work to which I shall make frequent reference, when I come to Akbar's religious innovations, is marked on the one hand by extreme acrimoniousness against Akbar's ministers and the Court proceedings, and on the other hand at times by oriental obsequiousness in its most extreme form. Budaoni took part in this expedition. He was at the time a Court preacher, but as he tells us that the ardour of fighting against the infidels was kindled in his breast, and so he obtained leave with some difficulty to join in the expedition. A decisive battle was fought at Kokandah; Budaoni tells us how he enquired from one of the Muhammedan Commanders, how the Royal troops could distinguish friendly and hostile Rajputs to which with Muhammedan arrogance, the latter replied: "On whichever side they may be killed, it will be a gain to Islam." The battle resulted in a victory to Man Sing to whose courage Budaoni does full credit. The latter was sent to report the victory to Court. He tells the story of his journey in a fashion which enables us to understand something about the conditions of travelling in those days. This is what he says: * "Thence by way of Bakhor and Mandalgara, I arrived at Amber, the home of Man Sing. Wherever we passed the circumstances of the battle were published, but the people would not credit our statements. By chance it happened, that at five koses from Amber, the elephant sank into a morass, and the more it went forward, the deeper it sank in the clay. And since this was my first service of such a nature, I was in a terrible fix. At last the country people of the neighbourhood came up, and said, 'Last year at this very spot a Royal elephant became logged. Let them pour a quantity of water on the clay and mud, and then the Royal elephant will come out easily enough.' Accordingly the water-carriers did so, and poured a quantity of water on, and the elephant became gradually extricated from the quagmire, and got to Amber; and the exultation of those people reached the very heavens." The elephant, I may mention, which he carried away was one of special value which Man Sing had been ordered particularly to capture. When Budaoni got to Court he had an interview with the Emperor which he describes thus: * "And during the first days of the month Rabi'ul-awwal, by the intervention of Raja Bhagwan Das, father of Raja Man Sing, I prostrated myself in the Audience-chamber at Fathepur, and delivered the despatches of the Amirs, together with the elephant. The Emperor asked: 'What is its name?' I replied, 'Ram-prasad.' His Majesty replied 'Since all this (success) has been brought about through the Pir, its name henceforth shall be Pir-prasad.' Next His Majesty said: 'They have written ever so many praises of you, tell me truly, in what army have you served, and what exploits have you performed?' I replied: 'In the presence of the Emperor, your Majesty's humble servant speaks even the truth, with a hundred fears and tremblings, how can he speak that which is not truth.' And then I related to him succinctly what had happened. Again he asked: 'Were you unarmed or armed?' I said: 'I had armour both for man and horse.' 'Where did you get it from?' he said. I replied: 'From Sayyid Abdullah Khan.' The Emperor was exceedingly pleased, and putting forth his hand to a heap of Ashrafis (which in those days, just like a heap in a treasury, used always to be laid before him) presented me with a sum of ninety-six Ashrafis, and said: 'Have you seen Sheikh Abdul Nabi (since your return)?' I answered: 'From the dust of the road I came to the Court, how could I have seen him?' Then the Emperor gave me a pair of splendid Nakhudi shawls (and said): 'Take these and go and see the Sheikh, and say to him for us : 'They are from our own private treasury, and we had them made on purpose for you, do you wear them.' I took them, and carried the message to the Sheikh, who was very much pleased. Then he asked : 'At the moment of taking leave of you.' I said : 'At the moment of joining battle remember to pray for me?' I replied : I then recited the prayer 'O God! pardon believers, male and female, and keep those who keep the Religion of Muhammad, and abandon those who abandon the Religion of Muhammad (on him be blessing and peace).' He said : 'That was sufficient, praise belongs to God!'"

* Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 242.

* Budaoni, Vol. II, pp. 243-44.

Man Sing got into trouble about the campaign inasmuch as Akbar was led to believe that he did not do his work thoroughly. Backbiters at the Court suggested that he had purposely spared the lands of the Rana and had not wasted them as, according to the invariable rule in Rajput campaigns, the Imperial army ought to have done. He did not, however, long remain in disgrace, and soon came into higher favour than ever. After this we hear nothing of Rajput wars, at least of wars of any importance during the rest of the reign.

CHAPTER XXVII.

My story takes me again to Kabul. After Abul Maali's death Mirza Muhammad Hakim became the Viceroy of Kabul being under the tutelage of a nobleman from Akbar's Court. The guardian and ward did not get on well together and so, as I have already told, the latter returned to India. This was Mirza Sulaiman's opportunity. Pressed by his wife Khurram Begum he again marched from Badakshan and invested Kabul. Failing to seize it by force his wife tried treachery. Sending presents to Mirza Muhammad Hakim to show her great affection for him she suggested that as she had no son of her own she looked upon him as her son. By these means she managed to arrange a meeting with him at a garden about 20 miles from Kabul, where her husband had laid an ambush. Mirza Hakim, who was not at Kabul itself which he had left in charge of one of his Lieutenants, proceeded towards the place of interview, but learning on the way that treachery was intended, fled towards India. When he reached the Indus, Khush Khabr Khan met him with a letter and large presents from Akbar; badly advised, however, the Mirza broke into rebellion against his elder brother and marched against Lahore. This act aroused Akbar to immediate action, and so with a large army he at once started from Agra to that place. Before he had reached Delhi the Mirza fled; probably the news that Mirza Sulaiman had abandoned the siege of Kabul was a partial inducement so to do. Akbar all the same marched to Lahore where the people rejoiced at his arrival. It was while he was here that the second of the Mirza rebellions started. I have already said that these Mirzas were the descendants of Taimur and had accompanied Humayan in his reconquest of Hindustan. Though well treated at the Imperial Court, they seem to have considered that they never were rewarded sufficiently. The names of the rebel Mirzas on this occasion were Ibrahim Hussain, Mirza Mohamed Hussain, Mirza Ulugh Beg and Shah Mirza, the former two being nephews of the two latter. They held at the time of their revolt Jagirs in the Sarkar (Province) of Sambhal, known as modern Rohilkund. They were soon driven from there and fled to Gujarat which country, by reason of its position and geographic character, seems ever to have been a favourite resort of rebels from the Delhi throne. Mirza Muhammad Hakim's invasion of India and the revolt of the Mirzas took place in the year A.D. 1566 and therefore chronologically were prior to the fighting at Chitor. This revolt was the first of a series of transactions which never ended until 20 years or more later by which time Akbar had thoroughly conquered Gujarat.

To digress for a moment, I should here mention that about this time Akbar had three male children born to him, all at Fathepur, now known as Fatehpur-Sikri, the eldest in A.D. 1569, the youngest in A.D. 1572. His spiritual guide at the time was one Sheik Salim Chisti, a resident of that place, and it was in his house that the three were born. The eldest Salim, afterwards known as Jehangir who succeeded him, was born of a Hindu mother the daughter of Behari Mul. The other two sons were Murad and Danyal. When they grew up, they gave themselves over totally to debauchery and died before their father.

To return to the Mirzas, when they fled from Rohilkund to Malwa they were chased from the latter place by the royal forces and so they went to Gujarat where Chenghiz Khan had made himself ruler. There they first seized the fort of Surat and then Broach. The distracted state of this country together with the fact that the Mirzas and other rebels found in it their most convenient refuge, caused Akbar to turn his thoughts seriously towards its conquest. He found it easy enough to overrun but very difficult to keep.

In 1572 A. D. he himself marched at the head of his troops and entered Ahmedabad, the capital, without any serious opposition. The nominal King of Gujarat, Muzaffar Shah, was found hidden in a corn field, the royal umbrella and canopy being picked up near a hedge where they had been abandoned. He was sent by Akbar as a State guest to Delhi. A disturbance caused by some of the hangers-on of the royal army, which resulted in the looting of some of the camps of the Gujarat chiefs, roused the Emperor to furious anger. The stolen property was restored and the offenders were trampled to death by elephants.

In the month of December 1572 Akbar for the first time saw the sea at Cambay; an event which we may compare to the first sight of Canopus by Baber. His army was ordered from there to proceed to Surat, but when Akbar along with it was at Broach, he heard that Ibrahim Mirza who had shortly before left that place, was raising disturbances in his immediate rear. Akbar himself with a small force said to have been not much more than a hundred in number pursued Ibrahim at great speed and found him posted on the banks of the river Sarnal. Amongst Akbar's hundred, however, were the best warriors of his Empire. To them Ibrahim opposed 2,000 troopers, so we are told. In a thick jungle close to Sarnal the two parties dashed together, and a hand-to-hand mêlée ensued. Bhoput Sing, son of Behari Mul, who distinguished himself amongst the foremost, fell early in the day, but out of the hundred we read of the death of no other cavalier of distinction. All vied with each other in feats of arms. At the very crisis of the fight, Akbar and Bhagwan Das charged the foe at full tilt, and their charge, so we are told, decided the day. Allowing for oriental flattery there is no doubt that the day was a glorious day for Akbar and for his Rajput brothers in arms. After a siege of one month and seventeen days, Surat surrendered in 1573. It was during this siege that Akbar is said to have first made acquaintance with the Portuguese. A story told about Akbar during this time does him but little credit. If true, it shows how the Rajput leaven was already working within him. Somebody in his presence praising the Rajputs' fearlessness of death and stating that amongst one of the Rajput clans, there was an exercise in which two men stood on one side with naked spikes and two others would rush on the same until the point came out from their backs. Akbar declared that he would do the same and thrust the handle of his sword in the wall for this purpose. Man Sing thrust the weapon aside, but before this was done Akbar was slightly cut; enraged with the latter he knocked him down and only the onstanders prevented further mischief.

Ibrahim, after his defeat at Sarnal, met the other Mirzas and quarrelled with them seemingly because they reproached him on his failure. He consequently separated from them and fled north. First of all he struck towards his old Jagir in Rohilkund. The story of his pursuit from there to the Punjab by Hasan Khan Takriah as told by Budaoni is most exciting. Hasan Khan was commonly considered mad; he had been a long time engaged in petty fights with rebel Afghans and with the Hindus of the Lower Himalaya Ranges in the country known as Kumaon. When he heard that Ibrahim Mirza had got to Sambhal he proceeded to attack him there. In this, according to Budaoni, he was not much helped by other royal Amirs; in one of the fights he was badly wounded but still persevered in commanding his troops from a litter. The capital of Sambhal

Bans Bareli, was for a time besieged by the Mirza. The royal Amirs were struck with fear and owed their safety to Hasan Khan's arrival. Budaoni tells us when the latter got there he addressed these cowardly Amirs as follows: * "Good God! the Mirza came to this neighbourhood with a small party of horse, while you with an army twice or four times as large as his were at the fortress of Sambhal; and you twenty or thirty Amirs, all old soldiers too, with a large force are so dismayed that you would shut yourselves up in the fortress of Ahar, which is a regular rat-hole. This will give occasion to the Mirza to become bold and to ravage the Imperial territories. Now there are two courses open to us, one of which we must follow. Either you must cross the Ganges, and under cover of that old fortress must intercept the Mirza, and prevent his getting over the Ganges. I will follow up in his rear, and we shall see what will happen. Or I will hasten and cross the Ganges and head the Mirza, while you pursue him. This is our duty as loyal subjects."

He did not, however, get these Amirs to act and with many curses at their cowardice he set off in pursuit of the Mirza himself. First of all he drove him across the Ganges and then in a long stern chase from Sirhind to Lahore. On hearing that Husain Kuli Khan, who had just returned from the siege of Nagarkot, was also on the track of the Mirza; he sent this message to him: † "Since you have come by forced marches from Nagarkot, and your army has been subjected to great exertion in the mountain district, and is not in proper condition, this victory is enough for you, now let other friends have a turn."

Husain Kuli Khan replied that he would wait, but all the same he proceeded at once to attack and attacking the Mirza's army unawares, defeated him near Tulambah about 80 miles from Mooltan. Hasan Khan coming up afterwards pressed Husain Kuli Khan to pursue, but the latter made excuses. Hasan Khan was not to be stopped, and although he had marched half across India continued with the few men left him in pursuit.

* Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 177.

† Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 161.

The Mirza fled with but a few followers and was attacked by some Jhils, Mooltan peasants who dispersed his remaining troops ; one of their arrows struck the Mirza himself. He took refuge in the abode of a Dervesh, but as Budaoni remarks where an ascetic is, there treachery is found. Accordingly the Dervesh sent news about the Mirza to a royal officer who made the Mirza a prisoner A.D. 1573. Hasan Khan according to Budaoni made some difficulty about seeing the Mirza, saying : "If when I see him I should salaam to him, it will be inconsistent with my loyalty to the Court; and if I do not, it will be uncourteous, and the Mirza will say to himself, **This Qulqachi*, when he received quarter at the siege of Satwas, thought good to make salaams without number ; now that evil days are fallen upon me, he treats me cavalierly." The Mirza sent word in reply that he waived the expecting of a salaam. Hasan Khan did eventually go and see him, however, and did make his salaam. After hearing his excuses in which the Mirza thanked God that Hasan Khan, a Sunni, and not Husain Kuli Khan, a Shiah, had defeated him, Hasan Khan left the Mirza imprisoned at Mooltan where he shortly afterwards died. Those of his followers who were made prisoners were treated according to the ordinary oriental fashion. About 300 of them were brought before the Emperor with skins of asses, hogs and dogs drawn before their faces ; some were tortured to death, some, history does not tell us how many, probably not many, were set free. Hasan Khan, on hearing of this, let the prisoners, he had himself taken, go. Thereafter he informed the court that as he had no orders concerning them he performed a gracious act which he was sure would be acceptable to His Majesty. Whatever Akbar might have thought he did nothing ; the bold offender was pardoned.

---

* Budaoni, Vol. II, pp. 162-163.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

WE now again return to Gujarat. When Akbar first proceeded there the chief men of the country had come into his camp and paid homage, but their obedience only continued as long as he was there. As soon as he returned to Agra, which he did shortly after the battle near Sarnal and the surrender of Surat, affairs in Gujarat again got into a state of confusion. The leader of the rebels, for the historians treat the Gujaratis always as such, was Ikhtiaru-I-Mulk. The Royal General Hasan Khan Karkarah found himself unable to meet his opponents in the field and threw himself into Ahmedabad. At the same time Muhammad Husain Mirza and Shah Mirza again raised forces and managed to seize a large part of the country. It was under these circumstances that Akbar showed perhaps the greatest instance of his personal activity. He himself looked after the task of preparing an army at Agra. Moghul soldiers were paid by grants of land and so it was difficult to get together an army fit to march at once, as the troops had to obtain from their grants the necessary money and equipment. To save time he supplied everything from the royal treasury. When all was ready Akbar started out ahead with a certain number of companions mounted on she camels and having delayed at Ajmere a short time, to pray at the tomb of the Chisti Saint buried there, but no where else, save for sleep and food, within nine days covered the 800 miles between Fatehpur Sikri and Pattan, a large town in Gujarat, near which he joined his troops. From thence he marched straight to Ahmedabad. There the Mirzas had already joined the rebel Gujaratis. On the morning of his arrival, we are told that, Muhammad Husain Mirza, hearing the royal drums and kettle-drums enquired from an officer in the Imperial army as to the new arrival. On his being told that the Emperor himself was present, he expressed his doubts inasmuch as the royal elephants were not to be seen and his intelligence was that Akbar only a fortnight earlier had been at Fatehpur. The officer replied that elephants could not travel 800 miles in nine days, but that Akbar was there all the same. Without delay the battle commenced. Akbar placed Abdur Rahim Mirza son of Bairam Khan, who was afterwards one of his greatest Generals, in the centre. He himself took command of no special division but had 100 picked horsemen attached to himself ready to fight wherever aid was most needed. Nizamuddin tells us that he charged the enemy's army like a fierce tiger. After a long fight the Gujaratis and Mirzas were totally defeated. Akbar distinguished himself amongst the foremost. Muhammad Husain Mirza was wounded and taken prisoner. When asked who took him prisoner, he answered, ingratitude to his Majesty. Brought before Akbar he was put into the custody of Rai Singh a Rajput Chief. He did not long survive. The rebel troops advancing to near where he was seated on an elephant in custody, the Rajputs attending him threw him to the ground and despatched him with their spears. Ikhtiaru-I-Mulk was also slain. After the victory the Emperor entered Ahmedabad. According to the regular Moghul fashion a pyramid was raised, from the skulls of those who had fallen in the battle; about two thousand in number.

Two or three years after the last named event Mirza Aziz Kokoh the Governor, one of the foster clan, was recalled as being incapable; there seems to have been not much fighting in his time; his successor was Vazir Khan, but the real authority was with Todar Mul. This Hindu's name has already been mentioned in connection with the overthrow of Khan Zaman. A Katri of Lahore, he seems easily to have raised himself into Akbar's graces (he was employed firstly by Salim Shah), but his first great charge was Gujarat. Todar Mul was as great as an administrator as a soldier and one of his first duties was to assess the Subah of Gujarat. In the rebellion of 1577 in which one of the Mirzas as usual played a part, Todar Mul showed all his best qualities. When Vazir Khan retreated, the Hindu Raja forced him to go on and to relieve Cambay which had been besieged and a battle close to Ahmedabad between rebels and Imperialists was only won by Todar Mul's unbroken determination. He himself, however was shortly afterwards sent to Bengal as matters there had become very serious and were calling for the best military and administrative talent in the Empire. Gujarat remained for a number of years in a very unsatisfactory state, although of open rebellion there was but little for the next few years when, as we shall see, Muzaffar Shah escaping from Delhi raised fresh commotions aided as usual by some of the Taimurid Mirzas.

CHAPTER XXIX.

BENGAL had since the beginning of the Thirteenth Century been ruled by Muhammedan rulers, who however, seldom professed allegiance even nominal to the rulers of Delhi. After Taimur's invasion it had been completely independent up to the time of Sher Shah. This Monarch brought to an end the dynasty ruling in his time. On his death it broke away from the rule of his successors and after the battle of Paniput we find an Afghan, Sulaiman Kararani ruling the country practically independent though nominally in subordination to Khan Zaman who was the Moghul Viceregent in the Eastern provinces. Sulaiman's Vazir Khan Jahan Lodi, who possessed jagir lands of his own on the Sone in Behar, seems to have been a man of very considerable abilities. Sulaiman was pressed on two sides; the Hindu King of Orissa on the South and the Moghul power on the North-West. His method of meeting this pressure was by maintaining friendly relations with the Moghul Court. Accordingly he allowed the Khutbah to be read and money to be coined in Akbar's name and sent away political refugees from his kingdom. By this means he was enabled to carry on undisturbed hostilities against the Hindu power to the South in which he seems to have been on the whole successful. On his death in 1572 A.D. his son Bayazid succeeded for a short time but being vain and incapable was murdered by the Afghan members of his Court; Sulaiman's youngest son Daud succeeded.

The Moghul Lord, of the Eastern Marches, at the time was Munim Khan who had been granted the title of Khan-Khanan.

Confused negotiations and intrigues went on between the various claimants to the Bengal throne after Bayazid's murder, for Daud did not succeed unopposed, in which the Moghuls joined. Civil war at last broke out. Daud, though he seems to have been a sensualist and wanting in manly intelligence, became eventually the sole ruler of Bengal. Khan Jehan Lodi was treacherously seized and put to death. His last advice to his murderer was conveyed in these words—"After I am killed, fight the Moghuls without hesitation. If you do not do so, they will attack you and you will not be able to help yourself." Concerning this murder Budaoni sententiously remarks * "Thus Daud struck his own foot with the axe and at the same time uprooted the plant of his prosperity with the spade of calamity."

As soon as Akbar was free from the Gujarat troubles, he turned his personal attention towards Bengal. Daud Khan commenced war by attacking Khan-Khanan on the western side of the Sone close to the Ganges. Being defeated, he threw himself into Patna. Down the river Jumna came the Emperor with a flotilla of boats from Agra. When he reached Pryag at the junction of the Ganges and Jumna, he built there a fort which he named Allahabad. The modern city still retains this name but for Hindus its former name Pryag is still in common use. In holiness Pryag does not yield to Benares itself. Budaoni regarding this place spits out the following:—

† "The Infidels consider this a holy place and with a desire to obtain the rewards which are promised in their creed, of which transmigration is one of the most prominent features, they submit themselves to all kinds of tortures. Some place their brainless heads under saws, others split their deceitful tongues in two, others enter Hell by casting themselves down the deep river from the top of a high tree." "Although he committed the crime for the sake of reward, he went to Hell all the same by that road of water."

* Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 177.

† Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 179.

Pushing rapidly forward in consequence of urgent letters from the Khan-Khanan, Akbar reached the outskirts of Patna early in August during the height of the rains. Daud Khan sent out an Embassy to treat with the Emperor. He got as reply a demand for Daud himself to come forth from the city and pay obeisance to Akbar. Nothing came of this. After a fight on the opposite side of the river near Hajipur, at which place the Gundak joins the Ganges, Daud embarked in a boat and fled to Bengal. His troops at the same time retreated by land. This is Nizamuddin's account of the retreat:—

* "Gujar Khan Kirani, who was Daud's minister, brought the elephants out, and fled by the rear of the city. On that dreadful night, a foretaste of the day of judgment, the inhabitants were in a state of bewilderment and despair. Some endeavoured to escape by the river, but through the crowding and struggling many of them were drowned. Others endeavoured to fly by land, but were crushed under the feet of elephants and horses in the narrow lanes and streets. Some in their despair cast themselves down from the walls and others perished in the moat. When Gujar Khan came to the Punpun river, he passed his elephants over the bridge; but the fugitives in his rear so pressed and crowded upon the bridge that it broke down, and numbers were precipitated into the water. Those who came up afterwards threw away their arms and clothes, and cast themselves into the river."

Akbar seems to have followed after several hours had elapsed in pursuit and the troops with him seemed to have done considerable execution, but probably in this case, as so often with Eastern armies, panic was the worst foe to the retreating Bengal force.

Shortly after this Garhi, near Rajmahal, which once had proved such an obstacle to Humayan, fell without hardly any resistance, Daud himself fleeing to Lower Bengal in the hope of recruiting a fresh army. Akbar himself returned to Agra where he arrived at the beginning of the year 1575 A. D. By this time Bengal had been almost entirely overrun by the Moghul troops amongst whom the Kakshals, a turbulent clan of Chagatai Turks, seem to have played an important part. We shall hear of them afterwards as rebelling against Akbar's power. The Khan-Khanan remained in nominal charge, but Todar Mul who was immediately under him seems to have been really the person in whom Akbar chiefly trusted. Within a month or two of Akbar's return to Agra, Daud was again in arms. A decisive battle at last took place at Moghulmari in the present district of Midnapur. The fight was long and doubtful. Gujar Khan, Daud's chief General, showed the most reckless bravery. The Moghul van was broken; Gujar Khan reached the Khan-Khanan himself, who slashed furiously at him with a whip, the only weapon he had. The Khan-Khanan was carried off the field. The day had been lost had the Bengal Afghans held together and not scattered to plunder the Moghul camp. Todar Mul seems to have turned the fortune of the day. Rising in his stirrups and shouting, what harm if the Khan be dead, what fear if the Khan-Khanan has run away, the Empire is ours, he rallied a body of troops and charged the scattered Afghans. Gujar Khan was killed and Daud fled from the field. Pursuit was immediate. Daud threw himself into the fort of Cuttack in the very heart of Orissa, but even there was unable to resist the victorious Moghuls. In a treaty made between him and Khan-Khanan in that place he undertook to do homage of service, to surrender his best elephants and pay up his tribute. He also promised eventually to appear at court. Todar Mul was wrath at the treaty, being all for unconditional submission, and when it was made in spite of him, returned in anger to the Imperial court. The Khan-Khanan's end came very shortly after. Insisting on holding his court as Viceroy of Bengal at Gaur, the former Bengal capital, although this place had been abandoned by the former rulers on account of its unhealthiness, he refused to remove in spite of the considerable mortality which resulted from his staying there. As Nizamuddin tells us—"Sickness of many kinds broke out among the people, and every day numbers of men departed from Gaur to the grave, and bade farewell to relatives and friends. By degrees the pestilence reached to such a pitch that men were unable to bury the dead, and cast the corpses into the river. Every day the death of many Amirs and officers were reported to Khan-Khanan, but he took no warning, and made no resolution to change his residence. He was so great a man that no one had courage to remove the cotton of heedlessness from his ears, and bring him to a sense of the actual position. His own health became affected, and he grew worse, and at the end of ten days in the month of Safar 983, he departed this life. His nobles and officers, who had so often met to congratulate him, now assembled to lament him." This was the end of Munim Khan, one of the last of the grandees who accompanied Humayun in his return to India. The newer generation had not known the sufferings of exile. Brought up in the Imperial court, their home and not their temporary residence, was India itself.

* Elliott, Vol. V, pp. 378—379.

---

CHAPTER XXX.

THE Khan-Khanan's death was a signal for a general recrudescence of revolt. The Kakshals who on the Khan's death were the principal Moghul leaders in Bengal, were unable to resist. Daud broke the peace into which he had entered; on hearing of this and of the successes obtained by him, Akbar sent Husain Kuli Khan who had been the Governor of Punjab and whom we have already met at Nagarkot, to Bengal, to take the Khan-Khanan's place. On his arrival he found affairs worse than he expected and wrote urgent messages to Akbar to come himself. Before, however, the latter did so the revolt was at an end.

Gujputi, the Hindu Zemindar, who had caused trouble in Behar was defeated and his levees dispersed. In a fight near Rajmahal, Daud was defeated by the new Governor and pursued by Todar Mul. When led before Husain Kuli Khan he was asked "where is the treaty you made and the oath that you swore?" to which he replied, "I made that treaty with Khan-Khanan, if you will alight, we will have a little friendly talk together and enter upon another treaty."* Husain Kuli Khan's reply was to order his immediate execution. With his death disturbances on a great scale by the old Afghan rulers ceased in Bengal. Henceforth if there be any trouble in this part of the world, it is from the new Moghul settlers and not from the older Afghans.

It was about this time that Husain Khan, the conqueror of Ibrahim, died. Sometime after the death of the latter person, he had fallen into disgrace in Court and was not allowed before the royal presence. On this account it is said that he determined to become a Kalendar and gave away all that he had. The Emperor on hearing this relented and allowed him to return to his old Perganah at the foot of the Himalayas. From there he made again incursions into the lower Himalayas, seemingly attracted by rumours of gold and silver mines. In these razzias he dealt harshly with the royal Governors of the forts which had been constructed by the Moghuls in some of the lower valleys and they reported to Akbar that he was in rebellion. In a fight with one of the Rajas of the lower hills he received a dangerous wound and was brought in that condition to Agra, where, after some days of extreme agony, he died. As a specimen of Budaoni's peculiar style, I give here a quotation as regards his death:—

† "And, that he might attain the full felicity of a true and regular martyrdom, in accordance with the authentic tradition: 'He that is afflicted with the colic is a martyr,' in that distress of expatriation, and grief of exile, and trouble of penury, together with the accident of a wound from Infidels received in a hostile country, and the distraction of a relaxed liver, he removed his baggage from this transitory existence to the eternal Paradise, and the bird of his soul escaping from the cage of this world, that prison of the Believer, at the invitation, 'Return thou, O soul, unto thy Lord, well pleased and well pleasing, flew towards the

* A. D. 1576.

† Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 225.

Rosebud, to dwell therein, rest, and in gracious favour, and a garden of delights.' ”

“ None ever came into the world, who remained there, Except he, of whom a good name remained.”

He was so poor when he died that he did not leave enough for his own funeral. Budaoni's affection for him seems to have been on two accounts. First of all because he was the most Orthodox of Orthodox Sunnis, ever desiring to war with the Hindus as Kafirs, a trait which recommended itself greatly to a man who thought that any one who paid Hindus the common politeness of saluting them had lost the purity of his Muhammedan faith, and secondly, because some part of his generosity had been showered on Budaoni himself.

CHAPTER XXXI.

RHOTASGARH which had ever been used by rebel Afghans now finally fell into Akbar's hands. This was not without severe fighting in which Kala Pahar, the Afgan leader, was killed by reason of being mounted on an unruly elephant. It was about this time that Akbar attempted to organise pilgrimages to the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. Muhammedan pilgrims had, from the earliest days of Muhammedanism in India, proceeded to these centres of their faith ; some by land and some, probably a greater number, by sea. The former route in the sixteenth century took pilgrims through the Shiah Kingdom of Persia and was therefore not a favourite with Orthodox Sunnis. On the other hand the sea route by which one embarked on the Western coast of India was uncertain both as to duration and as to safety, for the ships which carried pilgrims were ordinary trading boats and might proceed to the Persian Gulf or to the coast of Africa before attempting the passage of the Red Sea, if indeed they did not terminate their voyages altogether before reaching that sea. In such cases the pilgrims were forced to finish their journey as best they could. Since the Portuguese had become masters of the Western sea coasts of India, there had arisen another obstacle to the safe completion of the voyage, as being devout Catholics, the Portuguese objected strongly to any pilgrimages save those to the shrines of their own faith. On the other hand their avarice equalled their bigotry and a high remuneration ensured a safe conduct from them. To remedy this Akbar attempted first of all to lay down rules as to the Haj (as a pilgrimage to the holy cities is called) and to organise the same by appointing a Mir Haji (conductor of the Haj,) working out a plan similar to that by which the conduct of the ordinary Caravan across a desert is governed. He also entered into negotiations with the Portuguese. The main result was that some of the leading men from this Court, who went to Mecca by sea, seemed to have arrived there safely. We learn also that a relic came from Mecca to the Imperial Court in safety, as I shall subsequently relate, but all the same the nett result does not seem to have been altogether satisfactory and during the whole of the sixteenth century and indeed until a period far later, the Portuguese seemed to have permitted or not permitted the Haj much as they pleased.

Before the termination of the war in Bengal, Akbar's attention was called to the other extremity of his dominions. Sulaiman Mirza of whom we have heard, was driven out of his native Badakshan by his own grandson Shah Rukh and sought protection at the Imperial Court. Orders were sent to the Governor of the Punjab Husain Kuli Khan to replace Mirza Sulaiman, but this Governor being transferred to Bengal as I have already related, the matter dropped and Mirza Sulaiman went on pilgrimage to Mecca. The next few years saw a good deal of desultory fighting in Gujarat and also a rebellion, by the new Moghuls in Bengal. This latter seems to have been brought on by the oppressive conduct of Muzaffar Hussain Khan who had succeeded Hussain Kuli Khan as Governor of Bengal. He seems to have offended both by his fiscal administration and by the harshness of his language, not only the Afghans, but also the Moghuls who had settled in that part of India. To one noble he gave the bastanado; to the Kakshals who were the chief noblemen at the time he paid absolutely no respect nor showed the slightest consideration. The consequence was a revolt, Muzaffar Khan having to flee to the fort of Tandah. From thence he was allured by the Kakshals with promises of safety and then tortured to death. One of the Mirzas who had been sent by Akbar as a prisoner to Bengal, became the nominal head of the rebels. However, success did not continue. Raja Todar Mul along with several Muhammedan Generals were despatched from Head-quarters to put it down. After some little fighting, the leaders of the revolt were either killed, died of disease or fled south to the impenetrable wilds of Orissa. During the rest of the reign Bengal gave but little trouble.

More troublesome to Akbar was Mirza Muhammed Hakim's invasion of India in A.D. 1581. He advanced as far as Lahore to the fort of which he laid siege. Man Sing and his father commanded inside. Before the Mirza had reached Lahore a General of his had been killed in a skirmish with Man Sing's troops. Amongst this General's papers were found three letters to three of the Imperial noblemen of Court. These were sent on by the Rajput leader to Akbar who for a time held his peace about them. Shortly afterwards, however, as Akbar was advancing towards Lahore and was encamped at Paniput the Diwan (Financial Secretary) of the Mirza, professing to have deserted from the Mirza's service, came to the royal camp and asking for Shah Munsur one of the three to whom the letters had been addressed, made through him offers of service to Akbar. What followed I give in Nizamuddin's own words :* When Khwajah Shah Mansur announced his arrival, the Emperor's suspicions were aroused, and he thought that the Diwan's arriving at the time when his master was invading Hindustan must have some policy in it. He was already suspicious of Mansur, and his doubts were now confirmed. So he dismissed Mansur, and showed him the Mirza's letters. Mansur asseverated (his innocence), but it was of no use.

The Emperor proceeded to Shahabad, and Malik Ali brought him a letter to the following effect: "When my scouts were coming from the fort of Ludiana, which is under my charge, and reached the Sarai of Sirhind, they found a footman with swollen feet. This footman said to them, 'I belong to Sharaf Beg the servant of Khwajah Sháh Mansur. He is the Khwajah's Shikkdar (under-tenant) in his Jagir of Firozpur, thirty kos from Lahore. These letters are to be delivered to the Khwajah; as my feet are in a bad state, do you convey the letters quickly to him.' These letters my men have brought to me. When the Secretary opened them, one was a letter from Sharaf Beg to Khwajah Mansur, about the affairs of Firozpur, and the other was a letter from one person to another person, and of the following purport: 'I met Faruddin Khan, and he carried me to wait upon Muhammad Hakim Badshah. Although he had sent his Revenue Collectors into all the Perganahs of this quarter, he has not sent any to ours, but has held us exempt.' On hearing and considering these letters, it appeared to his Majesty that Sharaf Beg had written one of them to Khwajah Mansur, and that the other was certainly connected with the coming of Mirza Muhammad Hakim's Diwan Malik Sani to Khwajah Mansur. Many of the Amirs and officers of State were on bad terms with the Khwajah, and these exerted their influence to secure his death. So the Emperor gave the order for his execution, and he was hanged the next morning."

Sometime afterwards Akbar found out that the whole affair had been a plot and that the letters were forgeries; Mansur having been unpopular, mainly as it would seem on account of his strict carrying out of Akbar's financial measures. We are told that Akbar repented, but no repentance unfortunately could bring the dead man back to life.

Mirza Muhammad Hakim was unable to meet the royal army in battle and so retreated to Kabul; the royal army with Prince Murad in nominal command following. After it had arrived at and taken that capital Akbar himself followed in the Autumn of the year 1582 entered Kabul itself. This was the first time of his revisiting this place from the time when as a child he had set out with his father for the conquest of India. During this campaign Akbar built a fort at Attock on the Indus, a most important position as it commands the upper part of that stream.

In A.D. 1584 Mirza Muhammad Hakim died; he seems, like many others of the race of Taimur, to have been exceedingly fond of strong drink, and this probably hastened his end. On his death the two faithful Rajputs, Bhagwan Das and Man Sing, were sent to take possession of Kabul, of which place the latter became Governor. This is the only occasion which history records of a Hindu Governor of Kabul. Before the Mirza's death there had been a great deal of plotting in Badakshan; Sulaiman the old grandfather on the one hand having thrown in his lot with Baber's old enemies the Uzbeks and Shah Rukh more or less being supported by the Mirza. Finally, however, both Sulaiman and Shah Rukh came to Akbar's Court, the former dying in Lahore and the latter entering Akbar's services; marrying one of his daughters and becoming one of his leading Generals. Badakshan seems never to have been thoroughly recovered by Akbar; any hold he may have had on the country was of the very slightest, but the threatened aggression of the Uzbeks—for these sons of the desert were ever to be feared, they having no idea of containing themselves in the highlands of Central Asia—caused one great change in Akbar's life. He removed the head-quarters of his court from Agra to Lahore where it continued to be for fourteen years from 1584—1598 A.D. In the latter year Abdullah, the powerful Uzbek chief, died. After his death no further aggression seems to have been feared from the Uzbeks, and Akbar made again his capital Agra.

As regards the lands known as Southern Afghanistan and Sindh during this reign but little need be said. Early in the reign A.D. 1571 Bakhar, the chief town of the Muhammedan rulers of Sindh after a long siege, came into Akbar's power. Later on in the year 1591 Mirza Abdur Rahim Khan (Bairam's son) who got at that time the title of Khan-Khanan, had severe fighting with the local chiefs in Southern Sindh. Jani Beg, his chief opponent, fought against him both on land and in boats. The decisive factor in the campaign seems to have been the matter of supply. Finally, the rebels yielded and Sindh, nominally at least, became entirely an Imperial domain.

As regards Kandahar, the seat of Akbar's Government in Southern Afghanistan, there seems to have been no serious trouble either on the side of Persia or of rebellion during the reign.

The first result of Akbar's conquest of Kabul or rather of its incorporation within his Indian Empire, for Mirza Muhammad Hakim had always been semi-independent, was a fierce war in what we now call the North-West Frontier. The hill-men of that part, as the British know by long experience, are very dangerous in their native hills, being democratic to a degree and fanatically attached to their liberty. Fighting in the fastnesses of their country which afford the best of natural defences, they have ever resisted any attempts to bring them into subjection to any of the adjoining monarchies.

A special cause at this particular time set the whole of the frontier on fire. For many years Bayazid, a Muhammedan Secretary, had been preaching a special form of Muhammedanism in which communism on the one hand and the destruction of the enemies of Islam on the other, seem to have been two of the leading features. Add to this, his suggestion that he was the Mehdi (the Messiah) to come and we have all the elements of religious explosion. Bayazid died a few years before the time at which we now are, but one of his sons Jalaluddin, nicknamed by orthodox Muhammedans as Jalala (ignorant), carried on his work. He was still only a boy in the year 1585 A.D., but what with the veneration with which his father was remembered and what with the detestation of Akbar's regular troops marching to Kabul and holding the country in a very different way from the way that Mirza Muhammad Hakim had done; he was able to raise the whole of the frontier tribes into a combination against the new power, and as these tribes held the mountains and passes between the lowlands of Hindustan and the highlands of Afghanistan, they became a most formidable enemy. The followers of Jalala, I may say whether by way of disdain or praise, were nicknamed the Roshanis, i.e., the Illuminated. Many of the tribes such as the Yusufsais did not accept the religious creed of the Roshanis, being orthodox Sunnis, but all the same there was a combination of orthodox and heterodox, of the illuminated and non-illuminated against the Moghul power. Against the Yusufsais who seemed to have been the most important of the tribes at the time and who inhabited the country of Surat marched Zain Khan Kokoh at the end of year A.D. 1585. Supporting him came a few days later Abdul Fath and Raja Birbul. As long as the troops were in the plain country all went well, but when they got to the hills, things absolutely changed. There, as the British troops have too often experienced, a series of rearguard actions took place, the result of which was the complete disorganisation of the Royal troops. The historians tell us that the Generals themselves were at loggerheads with each other, that they had no common plan of action, and that the result was that the army got into a state of absolute confusion. The story of the last action I had better give in Nizamuddin's own words.

* "When they reached the pass of Karagar, a person observed to Raja Birbul that the Afghans meditated a night attack on that night, that the extent of the mountain and of the pass was only three or four kos, and that if they got through the pass, they would be safe from the attack designed. Raja Birbul, without making any communication to Zain Khan, pushed on to get through the pass and all his army followed at close of day, when the sun was about to set, they reached a defile, the height of which on every side were covered with Afghans. Arrows and stones were showered down upon the troops in the narrow pass, and in the darkness and in the narrow defile men lost their path and perished in recesses of the mountain. A terrible defeat and slaughter followed. Nearly 8,000 men were killed, and Raja Birbul, who fled for his life, was slain. Raja Dharm Singh, Khwaja Arab, bakshi of the army, and * * * were all killed. On the 5th Rabi-ul-awwal, Zain Khan Kokoh and Hakim Abul Fath were defeated and reached the fort of Attock with difficulty."

---

* Elliott, Vol. V, p. 451.

Akbar was, as was to be expected, greatly troubled by this untoward event. Raja Birbul was one of his best friends, and for two days after he neither ate nor would he see any one. Stories telling how this Raja had survived the defeat, and turning an astatic was wandering over the Afghan hills, were current for years afterwards. There seems to be no reasonable doubt that he was killed in this terrible action. Todar Mul and Man Sing were appointed to take the place of the dead Hindu General and of the disgraced Muhammedan. Characteristically the former originated a different sort of campaign. No more were there to be gigantic raids followed by withdrawal. On the other hand, a scientific exploitation of the country by the erection of forts was taken in hand. Of further actions we read but few; though in the latter days of the reign we read of further fights or rather skirmishes with Jalala. In one of these he fell at Ghazni many years after A.D. 1601.

Man Sing was not long retained as Governor of Kabul after these events. In 1587 A.D. he was transferred to the Government of Behar. It was about this time A.D. 1584 that Akbar got possession of Kashmir. Nearly half a century before this Mirza Haidar, parting from Humayun at Lahore, had seized this beautiful country. After his death it fell again into the hands of Native Chiefs; but when Akbar had well advanced in power, he being incited thereto largely by domestic dissensions amongst the rulers of Kashmir, determined to bring it again under Moghul sway.

As regards the actual fighting not much need be said. The conquest seems to have been comparatively easy, though there was the usual amount of desultory skirmishes.

In 1589 A.D. Akbar visited this his new conquest for the first time. It is not for me to describe the glories of this country, but my readers must remember, that what we talk of as a hill station was unknown to Akbar. The Himalayas were to the Moghuls ever the home of Kafirs and Jinns. Not in the greatest height of their power did they ever think as the modern English have done of making their summer residence in the lower ranges of these hills, and so the only substitute for a hill station, a substitute worth, however, much more than its original, which they ever knew, was Kashmir itself; Akbar twice visited this country, the second time in 1592 A.D. After his death, his successors especially Jehangir used constantly to be found in this most enchanting of regions.

I now have to return to Gujarat again. Revolts here broke out in the year 1584 A.D. on such a scale as to force the Royal troops into the forts leaving the rest of country at the mercy of the rebels. Muzaffar, who had formerly been taken prisoner by Akbar in the early seventies and who had escaped from Court, was one of the principal movers in the rebellion. Nizamuddin, the historian, was himself in the Deccan at the time as a Government servant and tells us that for a considerable time Akbar's power in Gujarat was entirely wiped out. To recover the province Mirza Abdur Rahim, Bairam's son the Khan-Khanan, was sent by Akbar. He attacked Muzaffar near Ahmedabad and after a severe action completely defeated him. In 1583 A.D. being defeated a second time Muzaffar Khan fled to Cutch praying for help from the Jam of that country. This, however either he did not get or if he did get it at all, he only had half-hearted assistance. After a variety of adventures in which he at times was temporarily successful, he was finally run to earth and taken prisoner in the year A.D. 1591. Shortly after his capture he cut his throat with a razor; with him ended the last dangerous rebellion in Gujarat.

From this time forward this province will be used as a jumping-off point for invasions of the Deccan, concerning which country I must now say a few words.

---

CHAPTER XXXII.

DECCAN.

I HAVE already in writing of Baber told how at the time he came to India there were five Muhammedan States in the Deccan. Early in Akbar's reign the ruler of Khandesh, Raja Ali Khan, became one of his feudatories, not altogether loyal certainly, but still in disputes between the North and the South generally to be found on the side of North. The Bidar Kingdom was by this time partly incorporated in Khandesh, partly in Ahmadnuggur. This last kingdom Ahmadnuggar, Bijapur and Golconda, which were the three remaining Deccan Muhammedan kingdoms, were at this time (about 1588 A.D.) at the height of their power. Combined they had overthrown, not many years after the accession of Akbar in the year A.D. 1565, the Raja of Bijanaggar at the battle of Talikot on the Krishna. The capital of this Raja, the town of Bijanaggar, was the largest town in Southern India, and its Hindu ruler practically ruled over the whole of the Peninsula South of the present Nizam's dominions. With his overthrow and death at Talikot the disintegration of the Hindu power in the South was complete, no new kingdom of any size succeeding, although but a small part of Bijanaggar territory fell under the direct power of the conquering Muhammedan States. Of the Muhammedan kingdoms, Ahmadnuggar was the furthest North, its boundary marching largely with that of Gujarat, and it was with Ahmadnuggar that after the final subjugation of Gujarat Akbar came in conflict.

The war with this State began in the good old-fashioned way. Burhan Nizam Shah II had been expelled by a rival faction from the throne, and seeking refuge in Akbar's dominions was treated by the Emperor with considerable favour and granted a jagir. After some time he managed to replace himself on his throne in A.D. 1590. In the following year Akbar sent ambassadors to the Kings of the Deccan demanding some sort of formal recognition of his over lordship of the Deccan. They all returned, so says Ferishta, with refusals on the part of the Kings, to admit Akbar's supremacy. As one of the kingdoms was Khandesh, of which Raja Ali Khan was ruler, and as this chieftain had long been more or less in Akbar's employ, the story as regards him cannot be correct, especially as we find him afterwards fighting on the Moghul side, but as regards the three kingdoms there is no doubt of its correctness. What had they to do with Delhi, they naturally asked?

Akbar's armies were not destined ever to reach either Bijapur or Golconda, but Ahmadnuggur territory was close to the Delhi Empire's boundary. Moreover Burhan Nizam Shah II being dead, this State was reduced more or less to anarchy, and consequently an Imperial party was to be found in the Kingdom itself. Prince Murad at the time was the nominal Governor of Gujarat, the Khan-Khanan Bairam's son being the real ruler. These two besieged Ahmadnuggur itself in A.D. 1505. For the three months that the siege lasted, approaches were made in the most approved fashion. The place was defended by Princess Chand Bibi, a Bijapur Princess, who showed by her conduct, that not only Rajputs but Muhammedan women could on occasions be the bravest of the brave. Ferishta tells us that Prince Murad and Sadik Muhammad Khan, one of the Royal Generals, being jealous of the Khan-Khanan, ordered an attack without giving the latter notice. What followed I tell in Ferishta's own words :*

“ Desirous of gaining all the credit of taking the place they set fire to the trains of the mines, upon which three exploded and blew up fifty guz (eighty feet) of the wall. The Moghuls now waited for the explosion of the other two mines, which had been destroyed by the besieged, who, recovering from the surprise occasioned by the explosion, defended the breach with great bravery. Chand Bibi appeared with a veil on her head. She caused guns to be brought to bear on the assailants, and stones to be hurled on them, so that they were repulsed in several repeated attacks. During the night, she stood by the workmen and caused the breach to be filled up nine feet before daylight with wood, stones, and earth, and dead carcasses."

---

* Ferishta, Vol. II, p. 272.

After this repulse negotiations were entered into between the two parties, the Moghul army suffering from a scarcity of provisions. The result of these was that it was agreed that Akbar should retain Bidar, one of the Deccan minor kingdoms which he had already overrun, while Ahmadnuggur should remain in the hands of the Nizam Shah. Chand Bibi thereupon resigned her authority to the youthful Bahadur Nizam Shah, the grandson of the late Burhan Nizam Shah. The real authority fell into the hands of his Minister and disturbances through this man's conduct began again. The peace made by Akbar's generals, was broken, whether by them or by the Ahmadnuggur Rulers it is difficult to say, but in any case the Khan-Khanan found himself shortly in face of a combined Ahmadnuggur Bijapur army with which he was forced to fight at the battle of Ashti A.D. 1597.

This was one of the most severely contested fights in Akbar's reign. Sohail Khan, who commanded the Bijapur troops, put to flight the Moghuls opposite to him, Raja Ali Khan of Khandesh being amongst the slain. The Khan-Khanan, on the other hand, was victorious over the troops opposed to him. On his return, from pursuing the enemy he was surprised to find that a great part of the latter's force still kept the field. He now learnt for the first time that the greater part of his army had been defeated and had fled. What followed I give in Ferishta's own language :* "Sohail Khan's troops unconsciously lit fires of flambeaux, which gave to Khan-Khanan an opportunity of perceiving their position. He accordingly ordered a few shots from his Artillery to be fired among them, which threw them into temporary confusion ; but Sohail Khan causing the fires to be extinguished, and changing his ground, avoided the danger, and sent skirmishers to collect such of his troops as might be found over the plain and in adjacent villages."

---

* Ferishta, Vol. II, pp. 275-76.

Khan-Khanan also took similar steps to collect his men by blowing his trumpets and beating to arms, which being heard by such of his troops as were in the vicinity they hastened to join him. Several of the Moghuls meeting with bands of the Decannies in the dark they fought and formed a scene of confusion not easily described, while "Allah! Allah! Oh God! Oh God!" resounded from all sides; and every eye was fixed with anxiety upon the East, in expectation of the dawn. When day appeared, Sohail Khan was seen marching towards the Moghuls with twelve thousand horse; and though the troops of Khan-Khanan did not exceed three or four thousand in number, he determined to dispute the field, and formed his line. The second battle raged with redoubled fury on both sides. Sohail Khan after performing prodigies of valour, worn out by fatigue and loss of blood from wounds he received in the action, fell from his horse. Some of his dependents, however, bore him off the ground, and his army, according to custom, followed, leaving Khan-Khanan master of the field; but being in no condition to pursue the fugitives, the Moghuls returned to Shahpoor."

The next fighting of any importance was caused by the defection of Raja Ali Khan's son, Mir Bahadur Khan. Besieged in Asir, a fortress of very great strength, even for Central India, he resisted the Moghul forces for over a year. Akbar himself came to the scene of action, to encourage his men and to superintend his Generals who were suspected, not altogether without cause, of slackness and unwillingness to act vigorously. Regular approaches were most difficult to make on account of the nature of the soil, and the fortress itself was only taken by the combined effects of pestilence, famine and fear of treachery. Bahadur's own men were willing to surrender him to Akbar, when he put an end to the siege by surrendering himself in A.D. 1600.

Bahadur Khan was sent as a State prisoner to Gwalior. As regards Ahmadnuggur, Chand Bibi, after the battle of Ashti, again resumed power, but her reign did not last long. She was accused of being in treaty with the invaders and murdered. Shortly after her death the Moghuls arrived and after a very short siege, carried the place by storm in A.D. 1601. All the country North of Khandesh as well as that country itself ceased in future to even have a shadow of independence. Ahmadnuggur, however, was not finally subdued by the fighting in A.D. 1601, and it was not till 40 years later that the State, of which it was the capital city, became finally incorporated within the Delhi dominions.

In the year 1598 A.D. the Imperial capital returned from Lahore to Agra. Akbar's two sons, Murad and Danyal, made nominal governors in the latter years of the reign of Gujarat and of the Deccan, died within a few years of each other on account of excessive drinking. Only one son, named Salim, remained, and he was by no means a favourite of his father. To Akbar's later days and death, I shall return hereafter. At present all that is necessary for me to say is that he died in 1605 A.D. two years after Queen Elizabeth, whose contemporary he was. His reign began two years before hers, but he was ten years her junior in age.

As regards the military results of this reign, they may be briefly summed up as follows :

In A.D. 1556 when Akbar came to the throne he was ruler of Central and Southern Afghanistan. His troops were also in military occupation of the Upper Punjab and the tracts immediately around Delhi and Agra. At his death he was undisputed lord of the whole of Hindustan North of the Vindhya hills, including Kashmir, still retaining full power over his Western domain of the highlands of Afghanistan up to the Southern passes of the Hindukush. On the East, moreover, his power stretched as far as Dacca and the Brahmaputra in lands where efficient Delhi rule had never stretched before. Gujarat and Malwa, till the Mahratta uprising a century after, ceased to give any trouble. Sindh also became wholly Moghul. On the Southern slopes of the Vindhya he had acquired a point d'appui for the conquest of Southern India. The power of the former Afghan families in Bengal, Behar and elsewhere had been totally broken. Rebellions during the next 100 years there may be, but these, if of Muhammedan origin, are invariably either of a member of the Royal family or of a discontented army officer. Territorial rebellions amongst Muhammedans totally ceased. The explanation of these results is not to be found merely or indeed mainly in the history of Akbar's wars. Arts of peace were needed to supplement the blows of battle. Later I propose to work out in some little detail what were the methods of administration whereby a modern State, for such his was, arose. The Afghans' kingdoms had never been more than purely feudal military hegemonies.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

OUR chief authorities as to the life of Akbar are four, all of whom had more or less to do with the events of the reign. These are Muhammad Kasim Ferishta, Nizam Uddin Ahmad, Abdul Kadir Budaoni, and Abul Fazl. The first, a native of Astrabad on the banks of the Caspian, spent the greater part of his life at the Bijapur Court. He is valuable sometimes as an eye-witness as in the case of the Deccan wars, and in the reign of Akbar's successor, Jehangir, he visited the Imperial Court. He is also considered the most reliable of all Indian historians who have written of any considerable period of Indian History, but still he hardly concerns us at present as the Deccan wars play but a very subordinate part in Akbar's reign, and he wants the personal touch of the others I have named. As to other events, we have the testimony of these three, all of whom were, during the greater part of the reign, holding situations at the Imperial Court. Of the three, Nizamuddin is a matter-of-fact prosaic chronicler; Abul Karim, a censorious critic, his view being perverted both by his orthodoxy and by the feeling that he was not rewarded properly by the Emperor; and Abul Fazl, a learned flatterer, to whom every act of his master is divinely inspired. As regards facts, I think we may take the first as the safest guide. A good Muhammedan himself, he does not feel called upon to criticise Akbar's deviations from orthodoxy. Wherever he was employed, and he held both in Gujarat and in the North-West on more than one occasion posts of responsibility, he seems to have behaved both with ability and integrity. That he was personally a lovable man is clear from the character given him by Budaoni who thus wrote about him after his death: "At the age of forty-five he succumbed to a burning fever, and left this transitory world, taking nothing with him but a good name. A host of friends and companions, who had been witnesses of the excellence of his qualities, and had entertained great hopes of him, and especially to the poor author (who cherished for him a kind of religious unanimity, and a sincere friendship free from all worldly motives), poured tears of regret from their eyes, and beat their bosoms with the stone of despair, and in the end had no resource left but patience and endurance, which is a characteristic of the pure, and a quality of the pious. I looked upon this event as the greatest misfortune, and took therefrom a perfect warning, so that I never afterwards formed a friendship with any human being, but regarded the corner of obscurity as best suited to me." In Abdul Kadir, we have a very different character. A native of Basawar near Budaon he got a thorough education of the old Muhammedan sort at Agra. Returning to his home he seems to have got his first service under Hasan Khan, the Subahdar of Sambhal. I have already quoted his praises of this man. He tells us himself in repentant language how in his own early days the eyes of his wisdom were covered with a film of lust, and he was enclosed in a net of lasciviousness, how in plain language he was detected in a discreditable intrigue and soundly belaboured by the offended parties. Coming to Akbar's Court he was given a petty appointment carrying with it the dignity of a Commander of twenty and made a Court preacher. Evidently no favourite of Akbar's, he never advanced far in the way of promotion. For some months once he absented himself from Court, and Akbar, declining to accept his plea of sickness, suspended his allowances. His grant of land was but small, and he is ever comparing himself to the better treated Abul Fazl. His hatred for not only Hindus but also for non-Sunni Muhammedans was intense. A Shiah was brutally and treacherously murdered by a Sunni at Lahore for having spoken disrespectfully of the four Caliphs. He has no words of pity for the murdered man who had, he says, a face like a pig, but the Sunni is a martyr. Superstitious to a degree he believes his infant son to have died because he did not have the Koran read over him. On the other hand, although anxious to learn sortilege, he draws back when his instructor tells him that the indispensable condition is that he should become a Shiah. Directed to translate into Persian the Hindu epics, the Mahabharat and Ramayan, he obeys much in the spirit of Pistol when eating the leak.

---

Defending his conduct in translating the latter he writes :*

“ And from that black book, which is naught like the book of my life, I flee to God for refuge. The transcription of atheism is not atheism, and I repeat the declaration of faith in opposition to heresy, why should I fear (which God forbid) that a book, which was all written against the grain, and in accordance with a strict command, should bring with it a curse. O God! I verily take refuge in thee from associating anything with thee, and I know, and I beg thy forgiveness for that which I know not, and I repent of it, and say : ‘ There is no God but Allah, and Muhammad is the prophet of Allah.’ And thus my penitence is no penitence caused by fear. May it be accepted at the Court of the Gracious and Liberal.” Faizi, Abul Fazl’s brother, a poet and a heretic, dies according to him barking like a dog. And yet he has a great respect for his own skin, and when Akbar mentions to Abul Fazl that Budaoni seems a bigoted lawyer such that ‘ no sword can sever the jugular vein of his bigotry,’ he defends himself from the charge, though in more favourable times he would have declared his bigotry or piety as he would have called it, a virtue and not a vice. From such a man we can expect that Akbar’s deviations from religious orthodoxy would find no favour, and that we have to discount his stories concerning the same, as being certainly exaggerated. Notwithstanding this, in general history we find his accounts closely tally with those of Nizamuddin, and as regards religious matters, though much is to be found in him alone, still where Abul Fazl and he speak of the same thing, it is the point of view rather than the fact that differs. As a whole then we may accept him as the speaker of truth.

---

* Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 378.

Abul Fazl was a very different character. His father, Mubarak, a man of great learning, was considered by the orthodox in the days of the Sur dynasty to be a heretic. More than once he narrowly escaped being punished with death. In all Muhammedan lands, there is a revolt on the part of some of the more imaginative and cultured against the dry bones alone offered by their religion. Islam, with its many virtues, is in its tendencies practical, hard, wanting in spirituality and opposed to the mysticism which is often the very salt of life and which leads men and women to be intoxicated in the divine love. God is, according to Islam, ever a Judge, never a familiar. Against this men's minds ever revolt, and in all Muhammedan countries from time to time sects spring up, whose underlying principle is a close personal communion with the deity. Surrounding circumstances may vary, creeds may differ, but there are ever in all lands, whether they be called Christian mystics, Muhammedan Sufis, or by any other name, persons to whom this intimate intercourse is the most real fact in their lives. In the tenth century after the Hegira all over the Muhammedan world there was a great religious ferment. As with the Christians when the first thousand years of their era were coming to an end, they imagined the end of the world was near. Muhammedans are taught that before the end comes there will be the rule of the Messiah, whom they name the Mehdi. Mubarak was profoundly impressed by these beliefs, and in them he brought up his two sons, Faizi and Abul Fazl. The former, a poet, was summoned to Court by Akbar when besieging Chitor. Akbar seems to have taken to him from the first, and when Abul Fazl was subsequently called there, his favourable reception was assured. Before this event he seems to have determined to live the life of a recluse. He writes in his Akbarnamah* : "As fortune did not at first assist me, I almost became selfish and conceited, and resolved to tread the path of proud retirement. The number of pupils that I had gathered around me, served but to increase my pedantry. In fact, the pride of learning had made my brain drunk with the idea of seclusion. Happily for myself, when I passed the nights in lonely spots with true seekers after truth, and enjoyed the society of such as are empty-handed, but in rich mind and heart, my eyes were open, and I saw the selfishness and covetousness of the so-called learned. The advice of my father with difficulty kept me back from outbreaks of folly ; my mind had no rest, and my heart felt itself drawn to the sages of Mongolia or to the hermits on Lebanon ; I longed for interviews with the Lamas of Thibet or with the Padris of Portugal, and would gladly sit with the priest of the Parsis and the learned of the Zendavesta. I was sick of the learned of my own land. My brother and other relatives then advised me to attend the Court, hoping that I would find in the Emperor a leader to the sublime world of thought. In vain did I at first resist their admonitions. Happy, indeed, am I now that I have found in my Sovereign a guide to the world of action and a comforter in lonely retirement ; in him meet my longing after faith and my desire to do my appointed work in the world ; he is the Orient where the light of form and ideal dawns ; and it is he who has taught me that the work of the world, multifarious as it is, may yet harmonise with the spiritual unity of truth. I was thus presented at Court. As I had no worthy treasures to lay at the feet of His Majesty, I wrote a commentary to the Ayatul-Kursi, and presented it when the Emperor was at Agra. I was favourably received, and His Majesty graciously accepted my offering." His rise was speedy. He soon acquired an influence over Akbar's mind, which, as far as speculative matters were concerned, was equalled by that of no other member of the Court. He was accused on all sides of having led away the Emperor from the true creed. Possibly, as I have already said, Hindu wives and Imperial policy had more than any other causes to do with this, but personal influence is ever considered the most potent and he became execrated by Muhammedans as the Arch Heretic.* Certain it is that he encouraged Akbar in his wandering away from the straight and narrow path of Islam.

---

* Blochmann, Vol. 1, pp. xi-xii.

His own views are summed up in the following lines†:—

“O God, in every temple I see people that seek Thee, and in every language I hear spoken, people praise Thee!

Polytheism and Islam feel after Thee,

Each religion says, “Thou art one, without equal.”

If it be a mosque, people murmur the holy prayer, and if it be a Christian Church, people ring the bell from love to Thee.

Sometimes I frequent the Christian cloister, and sometimes the mosque,

But it is Thou whom I search from temple to temple.

Thy elect have no dealings with either heresy or orthodoxy; for neither of them stands behind the screen of Thy truth.

Heresy to the heretic, and religion to the orthodox,

But the dust of the rose petal belongs to the heart of the perfume-seller.”

Whether Akbar entered into the whole of Abul Fazl's mysticism is doubtful. Probably as regards a great deal of his religious speculations he simply listened to him as he would to the doctrines of other religions, but it is certain that both were alike in strongly disliking orthodox Sunni Muhammedanism and in holding fast to the principle of religious toleration.

Abul Fazl seems for many a year to have almost constantly been an attendant on Akbar, but in the latter years of the reign after the death of his brother Faizi, who died 1595 A.D., he was sent on active service. This was to the Deccan. Bahadur Khan, son of Raja Ali Khan, tried to gain him over by means of bribes.

* See other passages.

† Blochmann, Vol. I, p. xxxii.

These, however, Abul Fazl refused. **"I have made a vow,"* said he in returning the presents, "not to accept presents till four conditions are fulfilled. (1) friendship; (2) that I should not value the gift too high; (3) that I should not have been anxious to get a present; and (4) necessity to accept it. Now supposing that the first three are applicable to the present case, the favour of the Empire has extinguished every desire in me of accepting gifts from others."

When Akbar himself came to the siege of Asir, he enquired into the work done by Abul Fazl, and was so well pleased that he promoted him to the rank of a Commander of 4,000. He did not long survive this promotion. He ever had a deadly enemy in Prince Salim who considered that, he was the cause of his father's affections being alienated from him. When going to Court from the Deccan in 1602 A.D., he was waylaid and killed by Bir Singh, a Bundela Chief, not very far from Ujain. Prince Salim who afterwards became Jehangir, and wrote his own Memoirs, writes thus about Abul Fazl's death: † "On my accession, I promoted Rajah Bir Singh, a Bundela Rajput, to a command of 3,000. He is one of my favourites, and he is certainly distinguished among his equals for his bravery, good character, and straightforwardness. My reason for promoting him was this. Towards the end of my father's reign, Shaik Abul Fazl, a Hindustani Sheikh by birth, who was well-known for his learning and wisdom, and who had externally ornamented himself with the jewel of loyalty, though he sold himself at a high price to my father, had been called from the Dakhin. He was no friend of mine, and damaged openly and secretly my reputation. Now about that time, evil-minded and mischievous men had made my father very angry with me, and I knew that, if Abul Fazl were to come back to Court, I would have been deprived of every chance to effect a reconciliation. As he had to pass on his way through the territory of Bir Singh Bundela, who at that time had rebelled against the Emperor, * Blochmann, Ain-i-Akbari, Vol. i, p. xxi.

† Blochmann Ain-i-Akbari Vol. i, p. xxvi.

I sent a message to the latter to say that, if he would waylay Abul Fazl and kill him, I would richly reward him. Heaven favoured him, and when Abul Fazl passed through his land, he stopped him on his way, dispersed after a short fight his men, killed him, and sent his head to me at Allahabad. Although my father was at first much vexed, Abul Fazl's death produced one good result. I could now without further annoyance go to my father and his bad opinion gradually wore away."

Abul Fazl was the author of two works concerning Akbar's reign; one is the Akbarnama, and the other the Ain-i-Akbari. The latter is mainly a statistical report of Akbar's dominions and is in this respect invaluable, but as regards the Akbarnama and the part of Ain-i-Akbari which is not statistical his extreme reverence for Akbar and his desire to hide everything inconsistent with the perfect character with which he endows Akbar; (for to him the Emperor's voice is rather that of a god than of a man) lessen very considerably his value as a historian. However, as I have already said about Budaoni, it is not so much as to Abul Fazl's facts as to his way of looking at the facts of which we have to be cautious.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

OUT of the accounts of the four historians, whom I have mentioned and particularly out of those of the last three one is able fairly well to reconstruct the main features of Akbar's life work. I have already at considerable length written concerning the wars in which he and his troops were constantly engaged. Now, I turn first of all to Akbar's personality and then to the administration of his extensive Empire. Before doing so, however, it is desirable to say a few words, even at the reproach of being tedious as to the Millieu in which he was brought up. The Chagatai Turks were in many ways different from the old Mongol sons of the steppes, but still they had much in common with the latter. The Torah, the divine law of Chenghiz Khan, was still quoted and when necessary put into practice. The kettledrums and horse-tails were still signs of dignity, and the Chagatais, though they were largely dwellers of towns, had never altogether given up their nomad habits. Baber and Humayun were never so happy as when dwelling like their ancestors before them in tents. Akbar himself was more of a dweller in houses than either his father or grandfather, but still he seems to have loved an occasional wander for the mere sake of wandering. His three great successors had the same feeling. Camp life was what they all seemed to have loved best. Indeed, the modern name for the language talked by the large majority of the people of Hindustan, a language I may say with a pure Hindi grammar, but with a very large infusion of Persian and Arabic words, is Urdu, which really means the camp language, the old Mongol encampment having been known as an Urdu. Along with this love these Chagatais had an intense love for sport as understood by them. The common form of this was an enormous battue. A large tract of country was surrounded on all sides by armed men, sometimes even by an army who gradually pressed in, driving the game into a more and more contracted space until at last hundreds of animals if not thousands, were congregated together and afforded easy and abundant sport to the ruler and his grandees. India in these days seems to have been a golden country for sportsmen. Tigers were to be found everywhere, elephants were found close to Agra, and wild asses abounded both near Bikanir and not very far from Benares. War by decimating the population must have necessarily aided in increasing wild beasts. An old Moghul custom maintained by the Muhammedan rulers long after Akbar's time was the weighing of themselves on certain days against gold, silver and precious stones and giving the same away. Akbar, seems to have faithfully followed this custom all the days of his life on the Persian New Year as well as on his birthday.

The Chagatai Muhammedanism had as its most special feature a great respect for holy men. These were very different in type from Catholic ascetics. With the Muhammedan holiness is rather the result of learning than of any special purity of life, and many of these holy men were really the leading politicians of Central Asia. Not only were they respected when alive, but their tombs were objects of pilgrimage when dead. Akbar had this respect imbibed in him from infancy. In his early days he was in the habit of making periodical pilgrimages from time to time to the shrine of one of the Chisti Saints at Ajmere. This he afterwards discontinued, but after many years Budaoni* tells us he went again to this place walking on foot for the last ten miles whereupon the author remarks: "But sensible people smiled, and said, 'It was strange that His Majesty should have such a faith in the Khwajah of Ajmere, while he rejected the foundation of everything, our prophet, from whose 'skirt' hundreds of thousands of saints of the highest degree had sprung.'"

It was in the house of one of the Chisti Saints that his sons were born. Near this house Akbar built a palace, and a small town sprang up. The place was locally called Sikri. Akbar gave it the name of Fatehpur-Sikri, and to this day it is one of the show places of India, being situated about 14 miles from Agra, and the buildings being in almost complete preservation. Budaoni, † the 'scandalous, says about this Chisti Saint the following :

"And such was the disposition of that paragon of excellence, his grace the Sheikh, that he allowed the Emperor to have the entree of all his most private apartments, and however much his sons and nephews kept saying, 'Our wives are becoming estranged from us,' the Emperor would answer, 'There is no dearth of women in the world, since I have made you Amirs, seek other wives, what does it matter?'"

"Either make no friendship with an elephant-driver, Or make a house fit for an elephant."

Akbar was brought up a Sunni, but his father Humayun seems to have imbibed some of the Shiah doctrines while in Persia, and Bairam Beg was a most rigid member of this sect.

* Budaoni, Vol. II. p. 280.

† Budaoni, Vol. II. p. 113.

The tendency of the Shiah doctrines is towards greater liberalism than that of Sunni-ism; but the Shiah of that time who had only shaken off the Sunni yoke half a century previous, was as proud and illiberal a person as any Sunni. The influences which surrounded Akbar in his early years, as far as they emanated from the men around him were those of a pure exclusive Muhammedan nature, save where these were modified by Central Asian traditions. It is almost certain, however, that in his father's harem and in his own in early days there was a number of Hindu women. One Muhammedan worthy of the time is said to have stated that a man should have four wives; one to bear children, one to nurse them, one to converse with, and one to whip as an example to the others.

These four, he added, should be of four different nationalities, viz., Afghan, Hindu, Persian and of Mawer-an-Naher. To the Hindu was given the duty of bringing up children, and it is very probable that in Akbar's youth Hindu women had much to do with his nurture and domestic education. It was amidst these surroundings that he grew up. He could hardly have failed to observe the self-seeking of most of the nobles of his court. In any case after Bairam's death, he seems to have determined to trust mainly to himself. We have a description of his personal appearance in Jehangir's Memoirs.

*" He was of middle stature but inclining to be tall; his complexion was wheaten or nut-coloured, rather dark than fair: his eyes and eyebrows dark and the latter running across into each other; with a handsome person, he had a lion's strength which was indicated by an extraordinary breadth of chest and the length of his arms and hands. On the left side of his nose there was a fleshy wart which in contemporary eyes appeared exceedingly beautiful and was considered auspicious of riches and prosperity. His voice was loud and his speech elegant and pleasing. His manners and habits were different from those of other people, and his visage was full of godly dignity."

---

* Jehangir's Memoirs, p. 45.

Extremely athletic and active, he would have been a terror of modern Ante-opium leagues for he, like his friends the Rajputs, was passionately addicted to this drug. On the other hand, he was not a lover of meat, and in this respect would have delighted our friends the vegetarians. As to his personal activity, I have related one instance of it already in his rapid journey from Agra to Pattan in the year 1573 A.D. He was accustomed to walk great distances, especially when on pilgrimage and was a first-class swimmer and rider. In his favourite game Chougan, a sort of polo, he excelled, and stories of his personal bravery and skill in killing tigers, even though they may be largely discounted, still bear witness to his intrepidity as a sportsman. He is said to have been able neither to read nor write. Neither was Homer nor many of the sages of old, but this did not prevent him from taking intense interest in matters such as history and theology, and in being able to comprehend intricate philosophical speculations. We are told that he was often to be seen early in the morning sitting on a stone in front of his palace at Fatehpur-Sikri, plunged in silent contemplation, and there can be no doubt that he grasped fully the main points in the various social and theological discussions which were carried on in his presence.

Budaoni with his ears ever open for scandalous stories tells us that Akbar in the first instance intended to connect himself by marriage with the nobles of Delhi, and that eunuchs were sent into various harems for the purposes of selecting daughters of these nobles. He adds that upon this a great terror fell upon the city. How the whole matter started he relates thus: **"A widowed daughter-in-law of Shaikh Badah, Fatimah by name (though unworthy of such an honourable appellation), through evil passions and pride of life, which bear the fruit of wantonness, by the intervention of her tire-women lived in adultery with Baqi Khan, brother of Buzrug Adhan Khan, whose house was near hers. And this adultery was afterwards dragged into a marriage. She used to bring with her to festive gatherings,* another daughter-in-law of Shaikh Badah, who had a husband living, whose name was Abul-ul-Wasi. And the story of the pious cat, which is told in the beginning of the Anwar-i-Sohaili, came true. Now this woman, whose husband was still living, was wonderfully beautiful, and altogether a charming wife without a peer. One day it chanced that the eyes of the Emperor fell upon her, and so he sent to the Shaikh a proposal of union and held out hopes to the husband. For it is law of the Moghul Emperor that, if the Emperor cast his eye with desire on any woman, the husband is bound to divorce her, as is shown in the story of Sultan Abu-Said and Mir Choban and his son Damashk Khawajah. Then Abul-ul-Wasi, reading the verse, 'God's earth is wide.'

---

* Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 59.

'To a master of the world the world is not narrow,' bound three divorces in the corner of the skirt of his wife, and went to the city Bidar in the Kingdom of the Deccan. and so was lost sight of; and that virtuous lady entered the Imperial Harem. Then Fatimah, at the instigation of her own father-in-law, urged that the Emperor should become connected in marriage with other nobles also of Agra and Delhi, that the relation of equality (between the different families) being manifested, any necessity for unreasonable preference might be avoided."

Budaoni connects this story with the attempt on Akbar's life by the slave of Mirza Sharufuddin. Anyhow Akbar, although he had Muhammedan wives, had Hindu wives also, and to them, as I have already said, probably, his first estrangement from the Muhammedan faith was due. On the whole we conclude that as regards women, Akbar was neither better nor worse than the average Eastern, much better certainly than most of the contemporary Kings of India at the time. Women did not influence him as to his general character, we never read of him as having been kept from any of his pursuits as warrior or king by any woman, but all the same as I have already said, like unto Solomon's wives, his Rajput Princesses led him away from the straight path. Up to a late period, he, however, seems to have paid in many ways great respect to his paternal religion. As a proof of this I may mention that in the year 1585 A.D. Abu Turab brought from Mecca a stone upon which there was said to be an impression of the Prophet's foot. His Majesty went out four kos to receive this stone with every mark of honour. An order was passed that all the Amirs in turn should carry it on their backs a few steps. So each one carried it a little way and brought it into the city.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A SECOND potent influence which led Akbar away from strict Sunni orthodoxy, is to be found in administrative reasons. Rigid Muhammedans may be great conquerors, but when once a country is conquered and settled down if they are to be great rulers, they cannot be guided altogether by the Koran. Christian rulers, even the most pious have recognised that they need to look elsewhere than the Bible in order to govern well, but the Muhammedan adopts the Koran not only as his rule of life but as his rule of Government. To him all the precepts necessary for a righteous rule are to be found in the one Arabic book. The consequence has been, especially in Muhammedan countries, where a part of the population is of a faith other than that of Islam, that the tendency of the ruling authorities has been towards a liberalism inconsistent with the strict rules laid down by Muhammad.

The self-seeking personal disaffection of many of these Muhammedan grandees drove Akbar more and more to seek Rajput support. The only solution of the problem how to make his subjects, Hindu and Muhammedan, equally his subjects was to introduce equality, whereas the touchstone of the Koran is inequality between believer and Kafir.

It was also necessary for this purpose to introduce absolute toleration as to which Akbar appears in a bright light beside many of his European contemporaries. But toleration is also inconsistent with orthodox doctrine.

A third cause which many may consider the most potent cause of all was the personal character of the leading Muhammedan divines themselves. The orthodox party's official head during the early part of his reign was one Mukhdum-ul-Mulk: Budaoni, orthodox as he is, has hard words to say as to this man's greed and haughtiness.

In the year 1575 A.D. we are told that Akbar built a Ibadat-khana (house of worship, where discussions as to religion took place. The building was divided into four parts—in one of which Syeds used to sit—in another the learned, in a third the men of ecstasy, and in a fourth the nobles. In these discussions the orthodox do not seem to have played a very dignified part, blustering rather than arguing and threatening rather than persuading. People of all sects were there as Abul Fazl tells us.* “Sufis, doctors, preachers, lawyers, Sunnis, Shiahs, Brahmans, Jains, Buddhists, Charbaks, Christians, Jews, Zoroastrians, and learned men of every belief, were gathered together in the Royal assembly, and were filled with delight. Each one fearlessly brought forward his assertions and arguments, and the disputations and contentions were long and heated. Every sect, in its vicinity and conceit, attacked and endeavoured to refute the statements of their antagonists. One night the Ibadat-khana was brightened by the presence of Padre Rudalf, who for intelligence and wisdom was unrivalled among Christian doctors. Several carping and bigoted men attacked him, and this afforded an opportunity for a display of the calm judgment and justice of the assembly. These men brought forward the old received assertions, and did not attempt to arrive at truth by reasoning. Their statements were torn to pieces, and they were nearly put to shame; and then they began to attack the contradictions in the Gospel, but they could not prove their assertions. With perfect calmness and earnest conviction of the truth, the Padre replied to their arguments, and then he went on to say: ‘If these men have such an opinion of our book, and if they believe the Koran to be the true word of God, then let a furnace be lighted, and let me, with the Gospel in my hand, and the Ulama with their holy book in their hands, walk into that testing place of truth, and the right will be manifest.’” The black-hearted mean spirited disputants shrank from this proposal, and answered only with angry words. This prejudice and violence greatly annoyed the impartial mind of the Emperor, and, with great discrimination and enlightenment, he said: 'Man's outward profession and the mere letter of Muhammedanism, without a heartfelt conviction, can avail nothing. *I have forced many Brahmans, by fear of my power, to adopt the religion of my ancestors; but now that my mind has been enlightened with the beams of truth, I have become convinced that the dark clouds of conceit and the mist of self-opinion have gathered round you, and that not a step can be made in advance without the torch of proof. The course only can be beneficial which we select with clear judgment. To repeat the words of the Creed, to perform circumcision, or to lie prostrate on the ground from dread of kingly power, can avail nothing in the sight of God.

---

* Elliott, Vol. VI, p. 59-60.

Obedience is not in prostration on the earth;

Practise sincerity, for righteousness is not borne upon the brow.

The Christians who came to the Imperial Court, one of whom Padre Rudolf Abul Fazl mentions, were Catholics from Goa. Catrou, a Jesuit Priest, has written a short history of the Moghul Dynasty founded on the Memoirs of a Venetian Signor Manouchi, for many years a Physician in the Imperial Court. He tells us how in response to a letter sent by Akbar to Goa, three priests were sent to Agra, viz., Fathers Rodolph Aquaviva, Antony Monserrat, and Francis Henrick. According to him Akbar was more or less persuaded that the Christian faith was true. He was dissuaded on account of State policy and personal reasons to abstain from embracing it. This we need hardly believe. Of the three Missionaries two returned after a short stay to Goa, but the third Father Rudolf stayed in the Imperial Court for some years. On a further occasion fresh Missionaries came from Goa. As to Akbar's religious convictions they gave various reports, but as regards the real facts there is no doubt that he never went further than the Roman pro-Consul who declared to the Apostle Paul "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." To the emblems of the Christian faith, such as the cross and the images of Jesus and His Mother, Akbar paid the utmost respect, and when he was presented with a Bible he placed it upon his head as a sign of respect. His children he made kiss the images, and made them also begin learning lessons by reciting the words "In the name of Jesus." But all this outward respect was nothing.

---

* Budaoni says it was a Muhammedan who made this challenge.

Akbar's religious views were not in any way towards the recognition of the Galilean as the incarnate God. If God was incarnate on earth, Akbar believed himself and no other as the incarnation. That he tended towards such a belief is certain. Flattery, perception of the smallness of the men, who vaunted most of their religious opinions, the feeling that he alone was capable of doing justice towards the whole of his subjects and of his superiority to those with whom he had to deal, all led him in this direction. The first step was a Fataha to the effect that a just ruler is a supreme judge in all religious matters, and that the Ulema (the wise men) are all subject to him in this respect. A ferman was published to this effect. It bore the seal and signature of Mukhdum-ul-Mulk and of other of the Chiefs of the Munammedan Hierarchy, but was probably the work of Abul Fazl, or as Budaoni suggests of his father. This document practically destroyed the power of the Ulema. About the same time in the year 1580 A.D. Akbar read himself in the Mosque the Khutbah. All at once we are told that he stammered and trembled, and though assisted by others, could scarcely read three verses of a poem, which Shaikh Faizi had composed, but came quickly down from the pulpit, and handed over the duties of Imam to Hafiz Muhammad Amin, the Court Katib. These are the verses:—

* "The Lord, who gave to us sovereignty,
 Who gave us a wise heart, and a strong hand,
 Who guided us in equity and justice,
 And drove from our thoughts all save equity.
 His description is higher than the range of thought, Exalted in His Majesty, Allahu Akbar."

* Budaoni. Vol. II, p. 277.

These last words have a double meaning. Literally they are God, he is the greatest, Akbar being an Arabic word for the greatest, but they can also be read as meaning Akbar he is god, and consequently, objections were raised by the orthodox to their being put on the coinage at the time. Akbar seems to have been tinged with the Mehdiism then prevalent, and to have got the idea that he was the Messiah who was to come in the year 1,000 of Hegira (corresponding with the Christian year 1592 A.D.) Before this year a religious sect known as the sect of the divine faith was founded at the Court, Akbar being the head thereof, and Abul Fazl and others of his family being the most conspicuous of its members. As regards outward observance, Akbar for a number of years previous to this, had verged more and more towards Hinduism. He appeared with a Brahmini mark in his forehead and with a Brahmini cord around his body. The killing of cattle was forbidden first of all one day of the week, and then on other days as well. The sun, which to use Mirabeau's words, was considered by the Members of the divine faith, if not God as his cousin-german, was worshipped four times a day. Wine shops, abominations to the orthodox were officially allowed. When Akbar appeared at the palace window in the morning, as the Moghul Emperors were wont to do, for only thus was it known that they were living, crowds of Brahmans used to greet him by prostration.* Budaoni says: "Cheating, thieving Brahmans collected another set of one thousand and one names of 'His Majesty the Sun' and told the Emperor that he was an incarnation, like Ram, Krishna, and other Infidel kings; and though Lord of the World, he had assumed the shape, in order to play with the people of our planet. In order to flatter him, they also brought Sanscrit verses said to have been taken from the sayings of ancient sages, in which it was predicted that a great conqueror would rise up in India, who would honour Brahmans and cows, and govern the earth with justice. They also wrote this nonsense on old looking paper, and showed it to the Emperor, who believed every word of it—'Every one to whom thou saidst, welcome was welcome.'"

---

* Budaoni. Vol. II, p. 336.

It was not only the old orthodox Muhammedans who stood aloof from all this. Man Sing on being asked to join the divine faith answered the Emperor very much in the same way that Colonel Kirk asked James II more than two centuries ago. Hindu he was, of Muhammedanism he knew, but of any further religion he neither had nor wanted to have any acquaintance. Nor was he alone in this. Other courtiers both Muhammedan and Hindu stood aside from these innovations. According to Budaoni only one class of men were exempted from the universal toleration shown by the Emperor, and these were the old orthodox Muhammedans. Probably like unto his contemporary Queen Elizabeth, Akbar cared little for their opinions but strongly objected to their teaching disloyalty.* As Budaoni says "one by one he sent all the Mullahs, against whom he had any suspicion of dissatisfaction, to the closet of annihilation. And having banished the Ulema of Lahore, he separated them from one another like a dishevelled thread."

A number of these men he sent to Kandahar to be exchanged for horses. What use the buyers derived from their purchase we are not told.

Akbar's religious tenets did not long survive his death, indeed they could not, for the sect of the divine faith without its head was practically a contradiction in terms, but his two immediate successors inherited from him the great principle of toleration, and though there was always a backward tendency, still it was only under his great grandson Aurungzeb that Koran Government and even then but partial Koran Government resumed its sway. The English, whether by way of inheritance or by reason of the necessity of their position, have adopted the views and principles of Akbar, and it is one of the greatest glories of their sway, that although there be millions of bigots still throughout this vast country, no inhabitant is harmed or treated unlike to any other on account of his faith whatever it may be. A minor but useful result of Akbar's religious eclecticism was the interest which he caused to be taken by Muhammedans in ancient Hinduism and its literature. He had both the Ramayana and the Mahabharata translated into Persian, and the greatest of his grandees were not above enquiring into the history of India as it was before the Muhammedan invasion

---

* Budaoni, Vol. II. p. 285.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WAR can build up an Empire. Of this there are numerous illustrations in Asiatic history, but only sound administration can maintain it when so built up. The foundation of all good administration is finance. Unjust taxation devours the means of the production of the community, so that it is incapable of producing in future; with such no rule can flourish. Injustice in the law courts only touches a very small section of the community, but unjust taxation reaches from the highest to the lowest. Now, in the East generally and in India in particular as I have already stated, the main sources from which all revenues derived is the land. In the time of the Moghuls and indeed even now there are but few great cities in India; so manufacture and trade only give a small part of the Imperial revenue which is mainly derived from the produce of the soil.

The Muhammedans who invaded and conquered Hindustan during the centuries previous to Akbar were more or less divided into clans, and the consequence was that the Ruler at Delhi was only the nominal ruler of a great part of the country. He would collect directly only the revenue of the country immediately around Delhi. Further away the clan chiefs would themselves collect the revenue, the country through which they collected it being termed their jagir or some other word expressive of the fact that it was land from which they and not the ruler collected the revenue. If the Delhi King were capable and powerful, these local chieftains would have to pay a certain part of the revenue so collected into the Imperial coffers. Little, however, ordinarily found its way from local sources into the Delhi treasury. Such a system ruled when Baber invaded India. I have already shown how Sher Shah tried to remedy this, and how he initiated a system of land taxation, whereby the greater part should come into the coffers of the State and not into those of the local rulers. Sher Shah's reign was, however, too short for any great reform. After his death the Empire fell into confusion, and it was only with Akbar that a system of scientific land taxation really came into force. His chief agent in this was Todar Mul, of whom I have already spoken as a warrior. The years of his activity as financier were roughly between 1570-1590 A. D. in which latter year he died in Lahore about the same time as Bhagwan Das, the father of Man Sing. It may be noted here that Akbar's chief General, Man Sing, was a Hindu ; so were his court favourite Raja Birbul and his chief Administrator Todar Mul. The foundation of the land settlement of Akbar was the measurement of land. Every British Administrator in India knows that, in order to have good administration a satisfactory land measurement, is necessary, both for the purpose of seeing that the Government demand is fairly assessed and for the purpose of protecting the cultivator from the many middlemen whom custom or grant has interposed between him and the State treasury. Such a measurement was ordered at Todar Mul's instigation by Akbar. As it was completed, revenue was assessed thereon, certain deductions for a short period being made on account of waste land capable of cultivation during which it was expected to be brought under cultivation. "For lands which had lain waste four years they were to receive a deduction of one-half for the first year, for the second year one-quarter, and for the third year they were to pay according to established rule. For lands which had lain untilled for two years, they were to receive a deduction of one-fourth for the first year. For uncultivated land, they were to receive a small allowance of grain, so as to make the lands capable of yielding revenue." Such deductions were necessary in order to encourage cultivation ; for, during the wars in the early part of the sixteenth century, large tracts of country had gone waste. The ordinary proportion taken by the treasury was a third roughly of the net produce. For the purpose of collection each tract of country, paying a crore of dams (Rs. 2,50,000) was put in charge of an officer named as a Krori. This was as regards Royal lands. Where there were jagirs or other lands of the same sort, the same course could not be exactly followed, for a jagir was land the revenue of which, subject to a certain payment, belonged to an individual. One of Todar Mul's great tasks was to resume as many of these jagirs as possible. A great many noblemen certainly managed to keep them, in spite of all Todar Mul's efforts, but, on the other hand, as they died, the State resumed most of them. Besides these jagirs belonging to nobles, which paid but little to the State, there was another sort of grant of land known as the Madadmash or Aimah (there are also a lot of other names for it) given ordinarily to Muhammedan Sayyids and learned men. Such a system lent itself to the greatest of abuses. One of Akbar's greatest reforms was the resumption of such land. Probably this more than anything else led to his unpopularity amongst the Muhammedan community. As to this, Budaoni* tells us the following :—

“ In this year His Majesty gave orders that the Aimahs of the whole Empire should not be let off by the Kroris of each pargunna, unless they brought the farman in which their grants, subsistence allowances, and pensions were described; to the Sadr for inspection and verification. For this reason a large number of worthy people from the extreme east of India to lands as far as went as Bakhar (on the Indus) came to Court. If any of them had a powerful protector in one of the Amirs, or near friends of His Majesty, he could manage to get his affair settled; but such as were destitute of such recommendations had to bribe Sayyid Abdur-ur-rasul, the Sheikh's head-man, or make presents to his chamberlains, door-keepers, and sweepers, in order to get their blanket out of the mire. Unless, however, they had either strong recommendations, or had recourse to bribery, they were utterly ruined. Many of the Aimahdars, without obtaining their object, died from the heat caused by the crowding of the multitudes. Though a report of this came to the ears of His Majesty, no one dared to take these unfortunate people before the Emperor. And when the Sheikh (the Sadr of the time) in all his pride and haughtiness, took his place upon his official seat, and influential Amirs introduced to him in his audience-hall scientific or pious men, the Sheikh used to receive them in his infamous manner, coming forward and paying respect to none. And after much asking, begging and exaggerating he allowed, for example, a teacher of the Hedayah and other college books, 100 bigahs more or less; and though such a man might have been a long time in possession of more extensive lands, the Sheikh took them away. But to men of no renown, to low fellows, even to Hindus, he granted lands for the first time. Thus, learning and learned men fell from day to day into lower estimation. Even in the very audience-hall, when after midday prayers he sat down on his throne of pride, and washed his hands and feet, he took care to spirt the water, which he had used, on the head and face and garments of the great Amirs and courtiers of high degree who were near, and made no exception. And they with a view to helping the poor suppliants bore all this, and condescended to fawn on him, and flatter and toady him to his heart's content, in the hope of securing at last some compensation for the insult.

---

* Budaoni, Vol. II, p. 207.

‘ When a rustic becomes a Judge,
He wills such decrees, that they will kill him.’

Never in the time of any Emperor had such absolute power been given into the hand of any Sadr.”

As the years of the reign went on, resumption orders became more and more imperative. After Todar Mul, Shah Fathullah became Dewan of the Empire. He is said to have been a man for whom Akbar had the greatest respect, although he would never deviate from the strict tenets of the Shiah sect to which he belonged. Of him, it is said, however, that he could not make a grant of five bigahs of land.

The East India Company had a very similar experience when it first took over direct collections of revenue. In the three provinces of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, everywhere claimants arose stating that they had had grants made to them by previous rulers. So grave became the nuisance that formal regulations had to be passed declaring that all grants which were not previous to a certain date were bad. To collect the revenue in each of the new districts found by Akbar, a revenue officer known as a Krori, as I have already mentioned, was appointed. It was his duty to superintend first of all the measurement. The power of distraint was given, but it was directed that it should only be used in extreme cases. These Kroris had instructions not to remit revenue on the Madadmash and Aimah grants without special instructions. How such a system worked out depended chiefly on the character of the Krori. According to our friend Budaoni, these officials showed themselves very oppressive. It is a difficult thing to prevent Eastern officials from using their position as a means of personal profit. However perfect any system may be in its institution, when it has to be worked by subordinates, corruption must more or less creep in. We know this to be the case even in the present day. In spite of vigilance on the part of the superior officials, still the custom of the country, as it is called, allows subordinates to take presents from those with whom they have to deal. We are not to imagine that Akbar's Kroris were any exception to this rule, but the fact that the provinces as a whole settled down so quietly is a proof that their exactions did not exceed a certain point. That Akbar knew the Kroris not to be ever clean is clear from a curious regulation that the Kroris' wealth when they died should be paid into the Royal treasury. Akbar's care for the cultivators and his knowledge that on them the welfare of the country mainly depended, is to be learnt from certain further rules which he made. Injuries to the crops done by the Imperial camp and its hangers-on as it encamped in any place were paid for by the State. A great laxity seems to have been allowed in the method of paying revenue either in kind or in money.

As regards Akbar's general fiscal arrangements, the greatest measures in his reign were the abolition of the Jizyah, a tax levied on all non-Muhammedans, the reduction of external custom duties and the abolition of internal transit duties. These latter, whether in Asia or in Europe, have always been a great source of revenue to small local chiefs, who by reason of them have exacted from merchants sums of money for the privilege of carrying their stores through the lands they rule; but have ever been a curse to trade and a cause of the greatest oppression. Akbar also reduced a number of petty irritating duties, such as trade licenses, taxes on trees and the like (he, however, demanded that presents should be made to himself), and on the whole was what nowadays we would call a free-trader. The whole system of taxation in his reign was reduced from complexity into comparative simplicity, its incidence falling mainly on certain large sources of income.

As regards military matters an officer's rank in the army was calculated by the number of men over whom he was set. There was a true calculation and a fictitious one. There was a calculation as to the number of footmen and as to the number of horsemen. The comparative rank of an officer can be told from his nominal rank; so can the allowances made to him; but it is unsafe to calculate from the nominal number of men over whom he was put, anything as to the number of effective soldiers he could put on the field. One of the duties of an officer was to bring his horses from time to time to muster. As to this all sorts of tricks were used. Officers, we are told, dressed up their retainers as cavalry-men and often mounted them on borrowed beasts, which were afterwards returned to their real owners. Consequently, the habit of branding horses (the brand mark was called Dagh) was introduced. This to some extent only stopped the mischief. The East was still the East, and tricks were played then as I have reason to believe, they are played even now, on officials to pass off as genuine counterfeit articles. Akbar's punishments though severe were probably less effective than those sanctioned by the present law, as participants in such frauds were commonly found amongst the supervising officials.

Akbar's chief reform as regards the coinage all was to call in the whole of the old coins. The ordinary complaints about false coining which always attend such a measure, are to be read in Budaoni's pages. These measures as to the unification of the coinage do not indeed seem to have been over-successful, especially in the remoter parts of the Empire, but still there was a limit put to the irregular coining in previous reigns, by fixing four head mints, viz., Agra, Ahmedabad, Kabul and the Capital of Bengal as the only places where gold might be coined.

As regards criminal justice, the Collector of revenue, or in jagir lands, the Tehsildar (Collector) was also the District Magistrate. Law matters would be referred to the local Kazis, but, as a rule, the one criminal justice in the country was the local revenue or military officer (very often the two were the same person). The Emperor himself was the final Court of Appeal, and when he appeared in front of his window every morning, as he was supposed to do even when his health was failing, it was open to any one who wanted to demand justice from him personally. I need hardly say that this demand was very seldom made.

As regards civil matters, Hindus in matters especially connected with their religion, seem to have been governed by local juries (punchaits) of their own. Muhammedans had their Kazi. As regards other cases, there was always a final appeal to the law officers at head-quarters. As regards one matter, Akbar passed a regulation which could not be but pleasing to the Hindus. He would not allow a Muhammedan to take a Hindu wife without the consent of her relations. If he attempted to do so, the woman was given back. In one civil matter, Akbar set an evil precedent. Kings before him had seized the property of their dead nobles now and again, but he seems to have made this into a practice. Private people, indeed inherited their relations' goods, but when it came to a high official, the treasury seized all and only allowed the dead man's heirs a part as a matter of favour. In this way large sums of money came into the Imperial coffers. Sometimes as in the case of Mukhdum-ul-Mulk, the avaricious Muhammedan divine of whom I have already written, an enormous sum was obtained on one death.

Akbar started both a postal and police system. The former was by means of runners. Thus, by a proper system of changes, the carrying of a letter from Agra to Ahmedabad was carried in five or six days, a distance of 900 miles. As to the police, they seem to have been solely a town police and were largely used as spies on the great men of the land.

As a builder Akbar's chief work is the fort at Agra. It took about eight years to build, and is to this day one of the most striking buildings of Muhammedan India. He also built, as I have already said, the palace at Fatehpur-Sikri and his father's tomb not far from Delhi. The latter is in itself a perfect illustration of the middle form of Muhammedan architecture, like to a Catholic Cathedral within which the world seems very far away. Glimpses from the parapet may be seen of modern and of the various mediæval Delhis, but save the cooing of pigeons and the occasional voices of a husbandman at work all seems still.

These are only three of Akbar's great buildings; others are to be found in many parts of Northern India.

---

CHAPTER XXXVII.

AKBAR died in the year 1605. His last years were troubled by the death of his children and by the ingratitude of his eldest and only surviving son Salim. I have already told how this latter Prince had caused the death of Abul Fazl, his father's most faithful friend. Man Sing, the most powerful noble in the kingdom, desired that Salim's son, Khusrao, and not Salim himself should succeed to the Imperial throne, and it is very doubtful, although we are told to the contrary, whether Akbar did not desire this himself to the last. His latter years like that of his great contemporary Queen Elizabeth of England closed in gloom. Stories are told of his death by poison, and it is added that the poison was contained in a pill intended for another. However, this may be, he died a broken man. Two of his sons had died ; his surviving son was hostile. The friends of his middle age had all predeceased him. Of his faithful Rajputs but one, Man Sing was living, and he was more intent on carving out a future for himself than caring for the dying man. Everything, when the end came, seemed dark. And yet what a wonderful work was this that Akbar did. Well, might he say like unto the great English builder : " If you seek my monument look around," for modern India is practically his work.

As a conqueror and warrior, he is not to be compared for one moment with his great progenitors, Chinghiz Khan and Taimur, but as the founder of a State, not one of the rulers of the East (I leave out China and Japan of which I know next to nothing) are to be compared to him. The only comparison I can make is to Omar, the second Khalifa after the prophet, whose commanding personality it was that made the Khalifate the great State it became. But the Khalifate was more successful, indeed almost solely successful, where the vast majority of the population under it was of the Muhammedan faith. By far the greater number, however, of Akbar's subjects were not Muhammedans but Hindus. To have welded these races together side-by-side, so that they might live as a common community, was Akbar's great work. Thereafter, in the history of India, we may read of a bigoted Muhammedan trying to persecute the Hindu community, or of Hindus interfering with Muhammedan rites, but it is seldom on a great scale and never for any length of time successful. Not only did he weld them into one community, but he gave them one common law. He perceived the truth of the axiom that the prosperity of the subjects is the prosperity of the State, and far and above any other great Eastern rulers of whom we read, he tried to act accordingly. The weakness of his Empire was really military. Stopping, as I have said, the influx of fresh blood from beyond the North-Western hills and acting on the principle of India for the Indians, he was the indirect cause that when the Empire built up by him was challenged by a hostile power, it turned out to be incapable of protecting itself. So strong, however, was its texture that though the Empire itself went down and though rule ceased from the Moghul race, the methods of government, some of which were introduced by him, and some of which were developed and systematised from older methods, have still held their own and are the basis of British rule to-day. That each person should be taxed according to his ability, that there should be shown no exemption or favour as regards this, that equal justice should be meted out and external foes kept at bay, that every man should be at liberty to believe what he pleases without any interference by the State with his conscience ; such are the principles upon which the British Government in India rests, and such are its real boast and strength. But all these principles were those of Akbar, and to him remains the undying glory of having been the first in Hindustan to put them into practice. These rules now underlie all modern Western States, but few even of such States can boast that these principles are as thoroughly carried out by them in this the twentieth century, as they were by Akbar himself more than three hundred years ago.

---

INDEX.

- Abbas Khan, the historian, p. 208 ; his account of the meetings of the Chiefs of Roh, p. 209 ; his account of the surrender of Puran Mal, pp. 211, 212 ; his eulogium on Sher Shah, p. 215.
- Abdoolmomin, a Sunni general, p. 43.
- Abdul Kader Budaoni, pp. 283—290.
- Abdur Rahim Mirza, Akbar's General, p. 262.
- Abdur Razzak, a Muhammedan writer, p. 153.
- Abu Bakr, the first Caliph, pp. 28, 69, 71.
- Abul Fazl, pp. 283—290.
- Abusaid Mirza, his character, p. 122.
- Account of four historians in Akbar's time, pp. 283—290.
- Adham Khan, son of Akbar's foster-mother, pp. 237—239, 241.
- Adil Shah, Sher Shah's eldest son, p. 216 ; his war with Selim Shah, p. 217.
- Afghanistan, test of its woman's virtue, p. 133.
- Afghan Muhammedan Sovereigns, period ruled by—extent of their kingdom, p. 5.
- Agra, how it sprang into importance—compared with Delhi as metropolis, p. 7.
- Ahmed Tambol, a Mongol, pp. 128, 131.
- Ahmed Khan (Sultan), pp. 51, 69.
- Ahriman, god of evil, p. 82.
- Ain-I-Akbari, statistical report of Akbar's dominion, p. 290.
- Akbar, a story about him, p. 13 ; his birth, p. 205 ; his appointment as Governor of Punjab, p. 224 ; proclamation of his being Padshah and his succession to the Imperial throne, p. 225 ; extent of his kingdom, p. 227 ; the cause of his will being supreme throughout the enormous tract of country, pp. 227—230 ; his character, pp. 230, 231 ; different periods of his reign, p. 232 ; as ruler and master of Hindus and Muhammedans alike, p. 233 ; attempts to murder him, p. 241 ; rebellion in west among his family-members, pp. 242, 243 ; rebellion in East, pp. 243, 244 ; inference as to the general principles of his rule, p. 246 ; his annexation-policy, p. 247 ; siege of Chitor, pp. 248—250 ; as spectator of fight between Jogis and Sannyasis at Thanesar, siege of Rantanbhor and Kalinjar, pp. 251, 252 ; siege of Nagarkot, p. 252 ; campaign against Rana Kaka, pp. 253, 254 ; Mirza's rebellions, p. 256 ; taking of Gujrat—his first sight of sea at Cambay—his fight with Ibrahim Mirza, p. 257 ; first acquaintance with Portuguese, p. 258 ; instances of his personal activity, p. 261 ; his organization as to pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, p. 269 ; his negotiation with Portuguese, p. 270 ; troublesome periods of his reign, pp. 271—276 ; his possession of Kashmir, p. 276 ; his ambassadors to Deccan Kings, p. 278 ; his retention of Bidar in Deccan, p. 279 ; siege of Asir, p. 281 ; military results of his reign, p. 282 ; chief authorities as to his life history, p. 283 ; his personality, pp. 290, 293—295 ; his religious convictions, pp. 298—301 ; his administration, pp. 302—309 ; the cause of his being unpopular among the Muhammedans, p. 304 ; his death, p. 309 ; criticism on him, pp. 310, 311.
- Akbarnama, p. 290.
- Ak Sunkar, the Seneschal of Lahore, p. 46.
- Ala Uddin (Sultan), Mubarak's grandson, pp. 101, 150.
- Ali Kuli Khan, known as Khan Zaman, pp. 243, 244, 246.
- Ali Mirza (Sultan), a typical Turk, pp. 127, 128.
- Alp Arslan, the founder of Turkish Sultan of Constantinople, p. 72.
- Altai Steeps, Chenghiz's burial place, p. 19.
- Amins, powers of, pp. 58, 59.
- Amir Husain, Taimur's brother-in-law, pp. 74, 75.
- Amir Tulik, his faith to Muhammedanism, p. 63.
- Apostle Paul, carrier of the gospels of Christ, p. 92.
- Arikbuka, pp. 32, 33, 35.
- Arshad-ud-din, p. 62.

- Aryans, their abode, p. 9.
- Asaf Khan, Akbar's general—Akbar's suspicion on him—his flight—his adventure—as told by Nizam-uddin, p. 245.
- Ashti, battle of, p. 280.
- Asia, its state when Taimur on throne and after his death, pp. 88, 89.
- Asir, its siege, p. 281.
- Askari, Humayun's brother, pp. 194, 222.
- Aurangzeb, the Great Moghul, pp. 3, 4, 13, 171.
- Azam Humayun, Ibrahim's Councillor, p. 116.
- Baber, the founder of Moghul Emperors of Delhi—his invitation to invade India, pp. 117, 140; his descent, p. 118; his autobiography, p. 120; an attempt to poison him—his marriage, p. 121; as to his mistakes in action—as to cowards, p. 122; as to ingratitude, p. 123; as to his submission to the will of God, pp. 124—129, 135; how he met his relations, p. 130; his first expedition, p. 134; his title as Padshah—his expedition to India—his embassy to Ibrahim, pp. 159, 141; his impression of India and its people, its advantages and disadvantages, pp. 142—145; his reign at Delhi, pp. 155, &c.; his determination to settle in India, p. 157; his appeal to his soldier, pp. 160, 161; his abstinence from strong drink—his war with Rana Sanga, p. 161; his title of Ghazi—storming of Chanderi, p. 162; his letter to Humayun, p. 163; his description of Gwalior, p. 165; his last letter to a friend, p. 166; his death—the chief bond of union—the Kalender, p. 167.
- Baghdad, the capital of the Caliphs, p. 28; its conquest by Mongols, p. 29; observatory at—plunder of, p. 30; second taking of, p. 77.
- Bahadur Shah, pp. 174—179, 244, 246, 281.
- Bahmini dynasty, its history, pp. 151, 152.
- Baichu, the Mongol General, pp. 24—26.
- Bairam Khan, Governor of Kandahar, pp. 222—225; as Regent, p. 232; his character—his official as Khan-Khanan, p. 233; instances of his irritability of temper, p. 234; Akbar's order for his pilgrimage to Mecca, p. 235; his dismissal—his revolt—his death, p. 236.
- Bajazet, p. 88.
- Barbak Shah, a relation of Hamid Khan and ruler of Jaunpur, pp. 104, 109.
- Bath in India, p. 145.
- Batu, Howorth's discourse on his position in Russia, pp. 36—38.
- Bayazid, son of Sulaiman, pp. 263, 274.
- Baz Bahadur, pp. 237, 238.
- Behari Mul, Kuchwaha of Amber, p. 247; gift of his daughter in marriage with Akbar, p. 248.
- Benares—its dedication and description, pp. 9 10; the centre of Hinduism, p. 142; its taking by Sher Shah, p. 193.
- Bereke, the first Muhammedan Mongol ruler, p. 39.
- Bhup Singh, son of Behari Mul, p. 257.
- Biber, successor of Kutuz, p. 49.
- Bikermajit, p. 166.
- Birbul, p. 275.
- Black Plague, Howorth's suggestion as to, p. 40, 41.
- Buddhism, pp. 9, 55.
- Buhlol Lodi, the founder of Lodi dynasty—his fortune in trade first—story as to his purchase of the kingdom of Delhi, p. 101; his possession of Delhi—his reign—his character, p. 103; his life as king, p. 104; his character as in Tarik-i-Daudi, p. 105; partial to Afghans of Roh, p. 180.
- Burhan Nizam Shah, pp. 278, 279.
- Byzantine, p. 45.
- Central Asia, pp. 10—12.
- Chagatai, his division of Central Khanate, p. 57.
- Chaitaniya, his doctrines, p. 147.
- Chand Bibi, Bijapur princess, pp. 279, 281.
- Chanderi, Baber's description as to its storming, p. 162.
- Chao, the paper-money, p. 51.
- Chausa, Humayun's defeat at, p. 199.
- Chenghiz Khan, the scourge of Asia, p. 11; the scourge of God, pp. 12, 13; his original name, his life, pp. 15, 38; his promise as in his letter, p. 16; stories of his dying words, pp. 18, 19; strains from chants of his mourners as given by Howorth—his burial, p. 19; his favourite amusement: Law of—his superstitious belief, p. 20; a story about him, p. 21; Mongols after his death, Chap. VII; breaking up his empire, p. 38.
- Chitor, taking of, pp. 175, 248, 249, 250.
- Christianity, p. 55; religion of Imperial Rome—its progress, pp. 90, 91, 94; its keynote, 92; being Roman in administration and Greek in doctrine—its contrast with Islamism, pp. 93, 95; prohibition of polygamy and permission of the use of intoxicating liquor—compared with Muhammedanism, p. 95.
- Chunar, its capture by Humayun, p. 190.
- Constantine, the Roman Emperor, p. 92.
- Dal Chand, the ruler of Bhatnir, p. 81.

- Darbandi-i-Ahanin, the Iron Gate, p. 60.
- Damascus, mausoleums in—head-quarters of Ommeyade conspiracy—sack of—burning of, p. 87.
- Danyal, Akbar's son, p. 257.
- Daud, son of Sulaiman, p. 264; his war with Akbar—his flight, p. 265; his war at Moghulmari, p. 266; his revolt and defeat near Rajmahal—his death, p. 268.
- Dayabhag, Hindu law, p. 142.
- Deccan at the time of Akbar, p. 278.
- Delhi, an Imperial city—known as Shahjahanabad—its foundation—situation of—site of new and old, p. 4; its fortification, p. 5; to Moghul as Calcutta and Bombay to Englishmen, p. 6; compared with Agra as metropolis, p. 7; Padshahate at, p. 11; an account of Taimur's battle at, pp. 83, 84; Sack of, 84; description of, p. 85; darkest period of Muhammedan rule in, p. 97.
- Dilun Boldak, Chenghiz Khan's birth-place, p. 15.
- Din Dar Mahommed, p. 46.
- Dost Mohommed Khan, p. 66.
- Doulat Khan Lodi, a Pathan ruler, pp. 98, 117.
- Ferganah, birth-place of Baber—its position, p. 119; invasion of, p. 127.
- Gaikathu Khan, his issue of paper-money and prohibition of metal currency, p. 51.
- Ganges, its source, course and fall, pp. 7, 8; its source as noted by Sharafuddin, p. 86.
- Ghazan Khan, the last of Ilkhans of Persia, p. 53; Rashid-uddin's report about him, p. 54.
- Ghazi Mahali, p. 216.
- Ghiasuddin Ghuri, p. 126.
- God's Hill, Chenghiz Khan's burial place, p. 19.
- Golden Horde, pp. 36, 38.
- Gou Mukhi, source of Ganges, p. 86.
- Gour, Afghan capital of Bengal, p. 191; its occupation by Moghul, p. 192.
- Grand Dalai Lama, origin of, p. 34.
- Guiragos, a Gregorian Chronicler his description of Ogotai's invasion, pp. 43-45.
- Gwalior, Baber's description of, p. 165.
- Haidar (Mirza), pp. 59, 64, 65, 66, 201, 202.
- Hamid Khan, Buhlol's rival story as to how Buhlol managed to turn him out of private life and seize the supreme power, pp. 102, 103.
- Harem, its sanctity, p. 104.
- Hari Kishen Birkis, p. 189.
- Hasan (Sheikh) his desire of beholding Sultan, —how treated by Sultan, pp. 106, 107.
- Hassain, founder of Bahmini dynasty, p. 150.
- Hastinapur, the abode of Kurus and Pandus, p. 5.
- Henry VIII, Ibrahim's contemporary in England, p. 116.
- Hezeber-ulla, the lion of God, p. 135.
- Himu, Adil's Prime Minister, pp. 219-221, 225, 226.
- Hindal, his rebellion, p. 193; his reign at Agra—Erskine's report as to the remonstrance against his conduct, p. 194; his death, p. 222.
- Hindu India, p. 9.
- Hindu Proper, the real land of, p. 2.
- Hinduism, pp. 9, 153.
- Hindustan, Chap. I; inclusion of the tract of land by the term, p. 2, end of Rajput rule over it, p. 5, the two great rivers of, pp. 7-10; as described by Baber, p. 145.
- Holy war (The), pp. 74, 80.
- Hubshi or Abyssinian, p. 3.
- Hulagu, his letter to Egyptian ruler, p. 47; his curious intercourse with rulers of Delhi, pp. 49, 50; opinions of Christians and Muhammedans as to him, p. 51.
- Humayun, the second of Moghuls, p. 5; his accession—his expulsion—his characteristic, p. 172; his first act, p. 173; his war with Bahadur Shah, p. 176; his reckless daring, p. 177; his abandoning all his conquest at Gujarat and Malwa, p. 178; his return from Gour, pp. 193-195; his defeat at Chausa, p. 199; with Askari to Agra,—his war against Sher Shah at Kanauj, pp. 200-202; his flight after the battle of Kanauj, pp. 203, 204; his privations, p. 204; his accepting hospitality of the Persian King—his conforming to Shiah faith, p. 206; his help from Shah Tahmash, p. 207; his motive to capture Kandahar—recovery of his son Akbar at Kabul, p. 222; his conquest in India, pp. 223, 224; his death, p. 224.
- Husain Kuli Khan, p. 252; succeeded Munim as Governor of Bengal, p. 267.
- Hussein Mirza, a cultured and accomplished Monarch, p. 134.
- Ibn Batuta, a Chinese traveller—a curious custom of Mongols as reported by him, p. 40.
- Ibrahim Lodi, the last of Pathan Sultan, p. 6; Sikandar's son and successor, p. 112; general condition of his Kingdom—his reign, pp. 113, 114; his ingenious device, to get rid of his father's chief ministers,

- p. 115; his death at the battle of Paniput, pp. 117, 141.
- Ibrahim Mirza, an Afghan of the Sur clan, p. 180; his defeat at Sarnal—his pursuit by Hasan Khan Takriah, p. 258; his message to and his defeat by Husain Kuli Khan near Tulambah, p. 259; his imprisonment—his death, p. 260.
- Ibrahim Shah, pp. 219, 221, 227.
- Ikbāl Khan, p. 98.
- Ikhtiar-i-Mulk, leader of the rebels at Gujarat, p. 262.
- Ilkhan Ghazan, p. 40.
- Ilkhans, Hulagu's descendants, p. 36.
- Imam Abu Hanifa, founder of one of the great Muhammedan sects, p. 87.
- Imam Riza, p. 43.
- India, denotation of the term—its boundary in school book—Burmah included in—one of the political divisions of Asia—a country or a continent, p. 1; line of division in, geographically, physically and ethnically, p. 2; which is the real history of, p. 9; reasons why it has been conquered again and again, p. 10; ultimate fate of British India, p. 15; impression of Baber as to India, its people, its advantages and disadvantages, pp. 141–145; Canal in, p. 146; advantages and disadvantages for Afghans and Turks to live in, p. 168; its present Muhammedans, p. 169; the principle of hereditary occupations creeps into everything in, p. 182; its land-revenue collections pure robbery and tyranny, p. 184.
- Indus, its source, course and fall, p. 7.
- Interneine strife after Sher Shah's death, pp. 219–221.
- Isad Bugha Khan, p. 66.
- Isan Daulat Begum, p. 67.
- Jalal Khan, Ibrahim's brother, p. 114; his war with his brother—his death, p. 115.
- Jalal Khan Lohani, pp. 187, 191, 192.
- Jamal-ud-din, an austere man, p. 59; his preach to the people, p. 60; his treatment by Taimur—his dream—his death, p. 62.
- Jalaluddin, pp. 274, 276.
- Jaribana, a payment for measuring the land, p. 183.
- Jauhar, Humayun's personal attendant, p. 204.
- Jehangir, Akbar's eldest son, pp. 248, 256.
- Jeimal, p. 159.
- Jelaluddin, pp. 17, 22.
- Jiji Anagah, Akbar's foster-mother, p. 233.
- John of Monte Corvino, Archbishop of Pekin, p. 55.
- Jusrath Khokha, a Khakkar-Mubarak's enemy, p. 100.
- Kabul, its description by Baber, pp. 132, 133.
- Kaidu, pp. 33, 35.
- Kala Musjid, p. 4.
- Kalender, its meaning, p. 155.
- Kalmuks, p. 37.
- Kamran, pp. 195, 221, 223.
- Kanauj, Humayun's war against Sher Shah at, pp. 200, 202.
- Kandurcha, Howorth's description of fight at, pp. 41, 42.
- Kasri Sabz, the Green Castle, p. 50.
- Kazaks, p. 37.
- Kerbela, protection of tomb at, p. 30.
- Kettledrum, a token of the presence of royalty, p. 33.
- Khalid, the lion of God, p. 136.
- Khan Khanan, Humayun's chief adviser, p. 200.
- Khan-khanan, the Khan of Khans, p. 233.
- Khanja Khalifa, Baber's Prime-Minister, p. 171.
- Khizr Khan, the founder of Sayid dynasty, p. 98; extent of his kingdom—proof of his being a Sayid—his death, p. 99.
- Khubilai Khan, successor of Mangu, p. 32; Mongol Court became officially Buddhist in his reign—conquest of—Howorth's description of his reign, p. 31.
- Khulagu or Hulagu, Mangu's relation and General, pp. 28, 31.
- Khusrau, pp. 85, 123, 131.
- Khwajah Kazi, p. 128.
- Kief, the Russian Mother of Cities, p. 23.
- King-Killing Custom, pp. 147, 153.
- Kipchak, the golden horde, p. 41.
- Kitubuka, p. 31.
- Kubla Khan, p. 32.
- Kuriltai, Howorth's reflections on, pp. 17, 18.
- Kurnavati—her presentation of bracelet to Humayun as call for succour, p. 175.
- Kutbuddin Hasan, p. 46.
- Kutb Minar, the great pillar of Altansh, p. 85.
- Kuttuz (Mameluk Sultan), p. 47.
- Kutula Khan, p. 12.
- Koyuk Khan, successor of Ogotai, pp. 24, 26.
- Lahore—its importance, p. 4; the half-way house, pp. 4, 5; its state in 1421, p. 100.
- Lama, p. 34.
- Lob Nor, a large lake, p. 10.
- Lodi, the name of Afghan family, p. 101.
- 'Ma Kha son', p. 54.
- Mahabharat, its translation into Persian language, pp. 285, 301.

- Mahmud (Sultan), p. 98.
Mahmud Ghazi (Sultan), p. 125.
Mahmud Lodi (Sultan), p. 156.
Muhammedanism, pp. 56, 62, 63, 64.
Mahum Anagah, Akbar's foster-mother, p. 233.
Maknun Khan Khaunm Farmuli, Ibrahim's Commander-in-Chief, p. 116.
Maldeo, ruler of Marwar, p. 213.
Malfuzat-Taimur of Nizam Shah, p. 73.
Malik Ikhtiar Uddin Karakush, p. 45.
Malik Iz Uddin Balban, p. 49.
Malik Nasir Uddin Muhammad, son of Hasan the Karluk, p. 49.
Mallu Khan, Chief General of Sultan Muhammad of Delhi, p. 82; his name as Kadar Shah—his peace with Sher Shah, p. 210.
Man Singh son of Bhagwan Das—Akbar's greatest general, p. 253; Governor of Kabul, p. 273; his transfer to the Government of Behar, p. 276.
Mangu Khan, successor of Kuyuk Khan, p. 26; his belief upon Christianity—extermination of Ismailiyas or Assassins, p. 27; his death, p. 31.
Marco Polo, p. 34.
Mati Dhwadsha, the Grand Lama, p. 34.
Maulana Nasiruddin Umar, p. 83.
Mecca, the permanent abode of Islam, p. 91.
Medini Rao, p. 162.
Meerut, capture of, p. 85.
Mehdi Khawaja, Baber's son-in-law—an intrigue to place him on the throne, p. 171.
Meshed, capture of, pp. 42, 43.
Messiah Jesus (Lord), p. 87.
Mihtar Mulla Khan, p. 7.
Minar Bliza, Minaret of Arolls, p. 87.
Mitaksbara, p. 142.
Moghul Empire—three pre-eminent towns established by, p. 3; Milton's lines p. 4; its source of strength, p. 5; cause of its decay, p. 14.
Moghul India, pp. 2, 3; not to be confounded with Muhammedan India, p. 3.
Moghul rule, its permanently in Deccan and Brahmaputra Valley—compared with Peterkin's glorious victory, p. 3. When its days were numbered, p. 6.
Moghulistan, wrath of God upon it, p. 60.
Mongo a devil and not a man, p. 30; his character, p. 96.
Mongols, the central tribe—their abode—their relationship—known as Chagatai Turks, p. 11; derivation of the word—their description in Chinese records—their characteristics, pp. 12, 13; heathen—Shamanism—idol worshipper—practising astrology, &c.—evil and good sides of these character, p. 14; their siege of Multan, p. 17; its founder (Chegniz Khan), p. 19; their favourite amusement, p. 20; after Chenghiz Khan's death, pp. 21—36; their war with Chinese and Japanese, p. 21; their invasion of Russia—their behaviour upon their captives, p. 23; their conquest in Syria and Asia Minor, p. 24; the reason of their not adopting Christianity, p. 25; description of Christian service at their head-quarters, p. 27; their prayer after sack of Baghdad, p. 29; religion of, p. 31; breaking up of the powers of, p. 32; description of their warfare, p. 33; the past services of, described by Marco Polo, pp. 35, 36; in the West pp. 36-55. Howorth's report as to their conversion to Islamism, p. 39; Howorth and Guiragos' description of, pp. 43-45; a pleasing story about, p. 46; their victorious career checked, pp. 47, 48; an incident of their characteristic punishment, p. 49; their administration, p. 51; their overthrows from from Persia, p. 55; in the East in fourteenth century, pp. 55-57; the cause of their overthrow in China, p. 55; a ghastly story about them, p. 56, in the centre, pp. 57-68; change of their religion, p. 57; their power at Moghulistan ceased, p. 71; their relation with children of Islam, p. 91; their preference to Muhammedanism rather than Christianity, p. 95.
Mubarak Shah, successor of Khizr Khan—his reign—extent of his Kingdom, p. 99; Mubarakabad founded by—his death, p. 100; story as to his justice, p. 110.
Mubariz Khan, Selim's son, p. 219.
Muhammad, the ruler of Khwarism, p. 16; Muhammad his flight, p. 91; his preaching and success, p. 94; his formulæ, p. 95; permission as to polygamy and prohibition of the use of liquor, p. 95.
Muhammad Adil Shah (Sultan), p. 219; story as to the character of Afghans of his time, pp. 220, 221; his death, p. 226.
Muhammad bin Farid Shah, Khizu Khan's grandson and successor of Mubarak, p. 101.
Muhammad Ghorî, p. 5; his invasion of India, p. 99.
Muhammad Hakim, the Viceroy of Kabul, p. 256; his invasion of India, pp. 256, 271; his retreat to Kabul, p. 272; his death, p. 273.
Muhammad Hasan Mirza, his ingratitude, p. 135.
Muhammad Kasim Ferishta, pp. 283, 284.
Muhammad Lodi, pp. 174, 188.

- Muhammad of Ghazni, p. 4.
 Muhammad Tugluk, p. 150.
 Muhammad Zaman Mirza, pp. 173, 174.
 Muhammedan law recognising no one save the cultivator, p. 182.
 Muhammedanism, its progress, pp. 91-96; its comparison with Christianity, p. 95; not recognising the law of primogeniture, p. 170; its recognition of holymen, p. 210.
 Muhassilana, fee for Tax-Collector and Measurer, p. 183.
 Muiz Uddin Bahram Shah, p. 45.
 Multan, siege of, p. 81; its conquest, p. 81.
 Munim Khan, pp. 242, 244, 263, 266, 267.
 Murad, Akbar's son, pp. 13, 257, 279, 282.
 Mutahis, temporary wives, p. 231.
 Muzaffar Shah, king of Gujarat—as a state guest to Delhi, p. 257; his fresh commotion, p. 263; his revolt at Gujarat and defeat—his death, p. 277.
 Muzzaffar Hussain Khan, Governor of Bengal, pp. 270, 271.
- Nadir Shah, p. 15.
 Nasir Seifud Dinlin Yagmur, p. 30.
 Nasrat Khan, p. 191.
 Nizam-uddin, tomb of, p. 85.
 Nemads, their settled habits, p. 38.
- Ogotai, son of Chenghiz Khan—his war in China—a story as to his recovery from illness, p. 22; another story as to his character—his death, p. 23; his invasion, pp. 43-45.
 Ottoman Turk, Taimur's greatest enemy, p. 87.
- Padre Rudolf in Ibadat Khana, p. 297.
 Paganism, pp. 94-96.
 Panipat, battle of, pp. 5, 6, 117, 226.
 Paper-money, issue of, p. 51.
 Pir Muhammad, Bairam's favourite, pp. 233, 234, 237, 238.
 Portuguese before the battle of Panipat, p. 154.
 Prithvi Rai, the Rajput ruler of Delhi—his defeat at Thanesar—end of Rajput rule, pp. 5, 148.
 Puran Mal, pp. 211, 212.
- Rajputs, their origin and character, p. 149; their manners as described by Todd, pp. 158, 159.
 Ramayan, its translation into Persian language, pp. 285, 301.
 Ramzan, p. 31.
 Rana Sanga, Ibrahim's obdurate enemy, pp. 116, 159, 160.
 Religious fanatics, an instance of, p. 87.
- Rigveda, p. 8.
 Rohtas, its description, p. 188; strategem as to its possession by Sher Shah, p. 189; its capture by Sher Shah, p. 190.
 Russia, the derivation of its name by Petis de la Croix, p. 78.
- Salar Masud, Muhammedan Ghazi, p. 109.
 Samarkand, Baber's taking of, pp. 124, 129.
 Sarwarul, Dewan and Vazir of Mubarak Shah, p. 100.
 Sayid Khan, King of Kashgar, p. 204.
 Selim Shah, Sher Shah's son and successor, pp. 216, 217, 218.
 Shah Abdali, p. 4.
 Shahabuddin, a Muhammedan leader, pp. 80, 125, 148.
 Shah Fathullah, p. 305.
 Shah Ismail, his conference with Shaibani, pp. 136, 137; his war, p. 138.
 Shahi Beg Khan (Shaibani), a story about his strength of character, pp. 69, 70; his defeat, p. 71. (See Shaibani.)
 Shahjahanabad, p. 4.
 Shah Rukh, pp. 118, 274.
 Shah Tahmasp, King of Persia, pp. 206, 207.
 Shaibani, pp. 69, 123, 131, 138.
 Shamans, Howorth's story concerning, pp. 31, 32.
 Shamsuddin, pp. 239, 240.
 Sharafuddin, pp. 75, 76, 86, 241, 242.
 Sheikh Alai, p. 219.
 Sheikh Ali, p. 100.
 Sheikh Bahlol, Humayun's envoy to Sher Shah, p. 194.
 Sheikh Bayazid, p. 209.
 Sheikh Hasan, pp. 106, 107.
 Sher Shah, the Afghan ruler of Behar, pp. 5, 172, 178; the derivation of the name, p. 180; his letter to the Governor of Chaundh, p. 185; his expression about the Moghuls, p. 186; his possession of Rohtas, p. 189; his distrust on Humayun, p. 191; his first victory against Moghuls, p. 193; his treaty with Humayun, p. 195; cause of the breaking up of the treaty, pp. 197, 198; his war with Humayun and its results, pp. 198, 199; as Padshah, p. 199; his war at Kanauj, pp. 200, 202; his dream as to the battle of Kanauj, p. 203; neither generous nor truthful, p. 206; his conquest, p. 208; suppression of the rebellion in Bengal, his taking of the fortress of Gwalior, p. 210; his march against Puran Mal, p. 211; his stratagem of forged letters—his war at Marwar, p. 213; his march to Chitor and thence to Kalinjar—his lust for a beautiful girl—his death—improvements made by him, p. 214; his burial, p. 215.

Sherif Uddin, Taimur's panegyrist, pp. 86, 87.

Shiaha, p. 30.

Shujaat Khan, p. 219.

Sikandar Khan, p. 220, 221.

Sikandar Lodi, the predecessor of Ibrahim, p. 6; successor of Bahlol Lodi—a curious story about him, pp. 106, 107; his desire to make a wholesale massacre of Hindus, p. 107; his character, pp. 108, 109; extent of his kingdom, p. 111; his administration, p. 112; his war with Moghuls at Sirhind, pp. 223, 224; his surrender to Akbar—his death, p. 227.

Sikhism, p. 147.

Sira Ordu or golden tent, p. 38.

Smyrna, head-quarters of the Christians, p. 88.

Sohail Khan, pp. 280, 281.

Soorajmul, p. 159.

Sulaiman (Mirza), pp. 233, 242, 243, 263, 270.

Sunawis, the fire-worshipper, p. 82.

Surtanis, p. 30.

Surat, its surrender to Akbar, p. 253.

Syria, massacre at, p. 31.

Tahmasp, p. 43.

Taimur, the founder of Moghuls of Delhi—massacre by his direction, p. 39; a founder of modern Russians, p. 42; overthrow of Mongol rule of Persia by him, p. 55; his conversion to Muhammedanism, pp. 61, 63; his reign, p. 66; his military exploits—his sack of Baghdad, p. 86; the undoubted head of Asia—prohibiting the use of wine—expedition against China—his death, p. 88; his life—his reign—his invasion of India and return, pp. 72, 117.

Tair, the Mongol Commander, p. 46.

Tajik, a town-dweller, p. 89.

Tardi Beg, p. 225.

Tarikh-i-Rashidi, p. 59.

Tatar Khan Sarang Khani, pp. 157, 158.

Tazukat-i-Taimur, the institutes of Taimur, p. 73.

Teguiri Kuchunder Ghasanu Keguluksen, p. 54.

Temujin, Chinghiz Khan's original name, p. 15.

Thaneswar, battle of, p. 5; fight between Jogis and Sannyasis at, p. 251.

Todar Mul, Akbar's Minister, pp. 244, 262, 266, 271; as financier, p. 303.

Torah (the), the divine law of Chinghiz Khan, p. 290.

Tulin, Ogotai's brother, p. 22.

Turk, life of, p. 11.

Udai Singh (Rana), the Chief of Sesodias, p. 248.

Ulugh Beg, p. 118.

Ulugh Khan-i-Azam, the Sultan of Delhi, pp. 49, 50.

Umar (Mirza), Baber's father, pp. 118, 120.

Umbrella, a story as to its use, p. 151.

Unity marks a country and its people, p. 1.

Uzbek Khan, pp. 40, 42.

Vaishnavism, p. 147.

Vasiruddin, p. 30.

Waba, disease known as plague, p. 98.

Yazdon, God of goodness, p. 82.

Yumis Khan, pp. 66, 68.

Zafar-Nama, p. 81.

Zafarnamah of Sharaf-uddin, 72.

HISTORY OF THE GREAT MOGHULS

VOLUME II.

JAHANGIR.

By the time of the death of Akbar* the Moghuls may be considered to have fairly established themselves in Hindustan. Before and after Taimur there had been Turks in the service of the Afghan Kings of Delhi; but it was only with Baber that the Moghuls or Chagatai Turks as they are ordinarily described by Eastern Writers, first became the permanent Masters of any part of Hindustan. Foreigners, as much so in many respects as the English themselves, coming from inland countries far beyond the gigantic snowy masses of the North-West frontier, they were never to be compared in numbers with the races of India whom they conquered or even with the Afghans, the previous rulers of this country; and when Sher Shah chased Humayun beyond the Indus, it seemed that theirs was only one of the many invasions of India, in which the conquerors have come and seen and conquered and then disappeared. But it was not as in other cases with the Moghuls; back they came and mainly by the genius of one man, Akbar the Great, settled themselves permanently in India, so much so that their chief Administrative methods have been followed by their English Successors. Their predecessors the Afghans, as I have already pointed out in my first Volume, never really got beyond tribal rule. It was Akbar who created a Civil service reaching from the throne down to the pettiest official in regular sequence, which was bound together by being subjected to one imperial centre. Caste, locality—these have always had great influence over matters Indian. It was Akbar's life struggle to lessen their influence and though his success was anything but absolute, it was immense. First of all really in his time was there a real Indian Government, and not a congeries of local, almost equally powerful, petty states. Allah Ho Akbar, so says the pious Musalman, God is great. Another translation of the same is Akbar is God, and supreme in this Indian world Akbar determined to be and was. How firm he lay the foundations of the Delhi throne will be seen in the history of the following century. Neither sensualist nor bigot could turn India back to the point where it was when he became ruler. And when the cataclysm came, when what with fainéant Kings, rebellious feudatories and wild Mahrattas the days of the Great Anarchy arrived, the basis of the Administrative structure was so firmly laid, that another foreign race, the English, found no great difficulty in stepping into the shoes of the Moghul Government and in carrying on the task of governing by Akbar's methods, although the Moghuls, deprived of the virility that came by constant accessions from their native home, had let drop from their feeble hands the reins of power.

* A. D. 1605.

There is one marked difference in the personal annals of the Great Moghuls commencing with Jahangir and onward and those of his predecessors. The brothers and close relations of the previous rulers, of Baber, Humayun and Akbar, had been often thorns in the flesh to these rulers, but all the same the heads of the house had uniformly treated these unruly members with great forbearance, and even after the breaking out into open rebellion again and again had received them anew into grace. It was only after revolts innumerable that Humayun had Kamran blinded and even this act was forced upon him sorely against his will. But with Jahangir all this changed. He indeed only went half way; he imprisons his rebellious son Khusrao but does not kill him; but after Jahangir up to the end of my story fratricide became the almost invariable accompaniment of a new accession. In Turkey the putting to death of all the brothers save the Ruler was for many a long day the rule, and this rule has been only too faithfully imitated in Moghul India. It did not in the slightest matter that the brother, nephew or cousin as the case might be, did not put up any claim to sovereignty. His blood was his crime. He might be dangerous and therefore was treated as if he were so. But we must not judge by crimes of this sort the general state of civilization and morals in the Delhi Empire. Where reasons of state were concerned and when brother murder had become an axiom of state policy, the rulers were inexorable. But when such reasons did not exist, although the rulers from the Emperor at Delhi down to the lowest foudar invested with power, had but little care for human life, for in the East it must be remembered that Napoleon's saying "l'homme n'est qu'un chien," a man is but a dog, is almost universally held by those in power to be true—and although we occasionally read of terrible arbitrary acts, as the story told by a European traveller of how a local governor had eight dancing girls beheaded because when called they did not appear sufficiently quick, still on the whole during the greater part of the period concerning which I write, justice was, on the whole, fairly administered, though punishments were, if judged by present standards, severe. Compared, however, with the English Code a century ago, the Moghul Criminal Code will fairly stand the test. The lands of the Moghuls too were on the whole well policed. The numerous European travellers, Doctors, Merchants and others could not have travelled as freely and as safely as they did, if it had not been that their lives and their properties were properly protected, and there is no reason to believe, in spite of the occasional vapourings of Jahangir whose Memoirs are prodigies of exaggeration, that human life and property were less secure in India at this time than at any other previous time; indeed, these were probably more secure than in a great part of Europe during the middle ages.

Jahangir—Salim as he was known before his accession—was the only son of Akbar that survived him. In my first Volume I have told my readers how he fell out of the good graces of his father—who more than half wished to disinherit him and how he caused Abul Fazl, Akbar's greatest personal friend amongst the Ministers, to be murdered. Jahangir has left behind him Memoirs purporting to be written by himself. Naive to a degree, they chiefly strike the reader by their enormous exaggerations. Thus, for instance, when writing of the wealth accumulated by his father he tells a story how an officer was directed by Akbar to find out how much gold was to be found in the treasury at Agra. "This officer obtained from different tradesmen in the city four hundred pairs of scales, which for a period of five months he kept at work both day and night, in weighing the coin and precious metals. At the end of that period my father sent to inquire how many maunds of gold had been brought to account. The reply was, that although for the whole of the five months a thousand men, with four hundred pairs of scales, had been night and day unceasingly employed in weighing the contents of one only of the treasuries, they had not yet completed that part of their work. On which my father despatched to desire that matters might be left as they stood; to return the metals to their places, to secure them under lock and seal, and repair to the presence. This, it is to be observed, was the treasury of one city only."*

Or again speaking of the establishment of elephants maintained by him he states that it was maintained at an annual expense of not less than four hundred and sixty lakhs of Ashrafis exclusive of what was incurred in supervising it. Examples of this sort may be multiplied indefinitely. Wherever he gives figures as to his Court, his throne, his revenue, or the income of other persons, the figures are childish in their obvious distention. And this being so, it is at least improbable that the imperial writer did not exaggerate where money was concerned alone. It is almost certain that he does so in other respects, for instance, as to his vices, as well as to his virtues. The amount of wine he drank according to himself would have probably consigned him to a grave in six months; instead of which he reigned almost twenty-four years. And as to his executions, the number of persons put to death by him on account of rebellion and sedition also probably appear tenfold more than they actually were. Writing as to these, he says: "And here I am compelled to observe, with whatever regret, that notwithstanding the frequent and sanguinary executions which have been dealt among the people of Hindustan, the number of the turbulent and disaffected never seems to diminish; for what with the examples made during the reign of my father, and subsequently of my own, there is scarcely a province in the empire in which either in battle or by the sword of the executioner, five and six hundred thousand human beings have not, at various periods, fallen victims to this fatal disposition to discontent and turbulence."

---

* Jahangir's Memoirs, p. 45.

If this be taken literally, more provinces than one would both in his father's and in his reign have been almost absolute deserts. From other sources we know that they were nothing of the kind. Still, although these Memoirs are very unreliable authorities for sober history, both on account of the spirit of exaggeration pervading them as well as on account of the Oriental tendency to fulsome flattery (even of one's self), still they are extremely valuable to the student of the time both as showing what Jahangir wished the world to believe him to be and what he actually was. They begin by stating twelve reforms which he on his accession introduced into the Empire. These related to the remission of certain forms of revenue, the effectual policing of the provinces, the due administration of justice, freedom of commerce, the inheriting by children of the properties of their parents, the abolition of cruel punishments and checks on administrative oppression, which, if carried out in their entirety, would have placed the Government of Hindustan as high in the scale of civilised powers as the foremost Western powers of the present day. But I am afraid that all we know about his reign shows that most of these orders were either totally neglected or but partially carried out. Amongst these twelve regulations are two—for both of which much may be said—but which read oddly amongst the others. The first is a prohibition during his birth month, Rabi-ul-Awal, of the use of animal meat and a further prohibition as to the slaughtering of animals on Thursdays and Sundays as well as on certain other fixed days. He quotes his father in support of this rule and doubtless the Hindu feelings which swayed his father were also very potent with him. The second regulation is the prohibition of the sale of wine throughout his dominions.

It is under the reasons given for this rule that he tells us of his own use of wine, as to which he admits that he was in the habit of taking it to such excess, that if he were but an hour without it, his hands would shake and he would be unable to sit or rest. He states he has reduced the daily amount of drink but he naively adds "as drink seems not less necessary than meat for the sustenance of man, it appears very difficult if not impossible for me to discontinue altogether its use." Still he hopes by God's help that when he comes to the age at which Humayun renounced it, he may also do the same. A strange person this to forbid the sale of wine! I need only add that under no circumstances could such a prohibition be efficient in India, where the manufacture of intoxicants is so easy and that the only result of such an order would increase the company of those, against whom the Koran uses so many words of reproach, the great company of the hypocrites. The twelve regulations are not the only instance in the Memoirs of self-laudation; but the point to be noted is this, and it speaks much for these Memoirs having been written by Jahangir himself or at least under his supervision, that he gives reasons for praising himself which others would consider as grounds for disapprobation. No woman could be fonder of gems and precious stones than he shows himself to have been; no child more credulous than he. His stories as to what jugglers did in his presence surpass all belief. At the same time he is a keen observer of nature. Unfortunately the Memoirs cover only a part of his reign, but as I have indicated above, they are far more valuable as a picture of himself than as an account of his deeds. To these Memoirs I shall have occasion from time to time to refer.

There is a tradition in Rajput records, given by Tod, that Akbar died by self-inflicted poison. Wishing to get rid of Raja Man Singh of Ambur, the nephew of his Rajput wife, and one of the chief Nobles of his Court, he handed to him a poisoned pill, keeping as he thought the innocuous portion; but unfortunately for himself he made a mistake and so died of the poison he had desired to give another. The story is not a very likely one. Man Singh was, since the death of Abul Fazl, the most trusty of his servants, and the one who had the greatest personal interest in the prosperity of the Empire for his sister was one of Jahangir's wives and also the mother of Khusrao, who, it had been suggested to Akbar, should be the successor to the throne instead of the drunken Salim. In Jahangir's Memoirs we read that while in a state of bad health it had been suggested to Akbar in the Harem that he might eat some fruit, that in his enfeebled state of health this entirely upset his stomach and that from this stomach attack he never recovered. Whatever may have been Akbar's feelings towards Jahangir, his only surviving son while in health, now that he was sick, he conversed kindly with him. He warned him to be careful how he entered the Palace and always to be guarded by his own men. This hint Jahangir took, whereupon the Palace attendants who were adherents of Khusrao, shut the gates against him. Akbar, considering that Jahangir had wilfully abstained from visiting him, broke out into reproaches, but in spite of all that his attendants could do to make him nominate Khusrao for the succession, he persisted in the choice of Jahangir. The Memoirs tell this part of the story thus :

“ To this the sick monarch replied, ‘ the decree is God's decree, and of him alone is sovereignty. For my own part, with one mind I retain a thousand hopes. Surely, in giving loose to such language in my presence, you have abandoned me to the jaws of death. Nevertheless it may happen that I have still some portion left in this life. If, however, the awful crisis be at hand, if the hour of departure be arrived, can I have forgotten the military promptitude, political sagacity, and other qualities indispensable to the successful exercise of sovereign power, which at Allahabad I witnessed in Salim Shah ? Neither do I find that the love and affection which I have ever borne him has for a moment been diminished. What if, through the misguidings of the evil one, he should for an instant have been led astray from his filial duty, is he not my eldest born, and, as such, the heir to my throne ; to that throne which by the institutes of my race belongs to the eldest son, and never descends to him who is in years the younger? But the six months' wide territory of Bengal I bestow upon Khusrao."*

After this Jahangir was again permitted to visit the palace at his father's request, and as the latter was lying on his death-bed he girt himself with the Emperor's favourite scimitar. Then the father addressed the son in these terms:

"My dear boy (baba), take this my last farewell for here we never meet again. Beware that thou dost not withdraw thy protecting regards from the secluded in my harem, that thou continue the same allowance for subsistence as was allotted by myself. Although my departure must cast a heavy burden upon thy mind, let not the words that are past be at once forgotten. Many a vow and many a covenant have been exchanged between us; break not the pledge which thou hast given me—forget it not. Beware! Many are the claims which I have upon thy soul. Be they great or be they small, do not thou forget them. Call to remembrance my deeds of martial glory. Forget not the exertions of that bounty which distributed so many a jewel. My servants and dependants, when I am gone, do not thou forget, nor the afflicted in the hour of need. Ponder word for word on all that I have said—do thou bear all in mind; and, again, forget me not."†

Thereafter the attendant Muhammedan Imam repeated the Kalimah, the profession of Muhammedan faith—which the dying Monarch in a clear voice repeated after him. Thereafter some chapters of the Koran and then the end. Hater of Muhammedan theology, opponent of Muhammedan orthodoxy as he was, Akbar still found comfort in the supreme hour, as many a heterodox Muhammedan or Christian has found before and after him, in a simple confession of trust in the Father of all whether this be found in the formulas of Islam or in the Lord's prayer.

Jahangir succeeded to the vacant throne without a struggle. Plans to place Khusrao on the throne vanished into mid air. Everywhere his father was proclaimed Akbar's successor. Whether Man Singh * Jahangir's Memoirs, p. 74.

† Jahangir's Memoirs, p. 77.

had the belief that his influence would be greater with Khusrao as Emperor than with Jahangir or not he did nothing to promote the son's succession. Khusrao was placed in semi-confinement and for some months it seemed as if Jahangir's right to the throne was uncontested. But this state of things did not last long. The Imperial Court was at Agra. Khusrao, on pretext of visiting his grandfather's tomb some miles out, started towards the North-West with a small company of retainers, beating up recruits on his way. Jahangir tells us that he was in doubt at first whether he should pursue his disobedient son or leave this to his Generals. His good fortune led him, so he says, to decide that he should go himself, an advance force starting ahead under Shaikh Farid. At Muttra, Khusrao met Hassan Beg Khan Badakshi with two to three hundred men. Making this Hassan Khan as his Commandant, the latter a true Turkoman took to his occupation kindly, understanding it to be his duty to loot wherever he could. "Every one whom they met on the road they plundered, and took from him his horse or goods. Merchants and travellers were pillaged, and wherever these insurgents went, there was no security for the women and children. Khusrao saw with his own eyes that a cultivated country was being wasted and oppressed, and their atrocities made people feel that death was a thousand times preferable. The poor people had no resource but to join them. If fortune had been at all friendly to him, he would have been overwhelmed with shame and repentance, and would have come to me without the least apprehension."* Although such people may be forced to join an army, they are of no use to it, and so Khusrao's course was one continuous flight, past Delhi, past Panipat, to Lahore. This city he fruitlessly attacked, the Imperial army ever swelling in numbers, now being close. At the bridge of Gundwal the two forces met. At first the royal troops were largely outnumbered, but numbers count for little in Eastern fighting, and amongst Jahangir's troops were the well-known fighting clan, the Sayads of Barha. Khusrao's troops were hopelessly defeated and he himself surrendered. On the 3rd of Mohurram 1015, so says the Memoirs, he was brought into the royal presence, trembling and weeping. He was put into strict custody. The Memoirs tell us "that in sorrow for his past misconduct the unhappy Khusrao neither ate nor drank for the space of three days and three nights, which he consumed in tears and groans, hunger and thirst, and all those tokens of deep repentance, peculiar only to those on earth who have sustained the character of prophets and saints, but who have, nevertheless, found that a slight daily repast is still necessary to the support of life. It may be superfluous to remark, that an abstinence carried to the extremity of an entire fast for three days and three nights together, would inevitably have sent him on the fourth day to the bosom of mercy."*

* Elliott, Vol. VI, p. 293.

The last remark is typical of the writer. Of the prisoners taken many were impaled on sharp stakes set up in the bed of the Ravi in front of the city of Lahore.

Khusrao never again escaped; a number of years later on it was thought that the Emperor was inclined to take him into favour; but this thought was shortly followed by his death, caused, it is hinted, by poison, administered at the instance of a brother who later on became Emperor under the name of Shah Jahan.

Jahangir had four sons besides the ill-fated Khusrao. Their names were, Kharram, Parvez, Shahriar and Sultan Bukht. Of these Parvez was at the time of the succession in the Deccan where he had his hands full by reason of the unsettled state of the Ahmednuggur kingdom, which though it had been subdued by Akbar and his generals, had never been really incorporated with the Delhi Empire, and where scions of the Nizam dynasty were one after the other set on the throne by Malik Ambar, an Abyssinian who by reason of merit had raised himself to a leading position in that state. This Deccan war lasted practically throughout the whole of Jahangir's reign and to it I shall refer again. At present it is only necessary to state that one of the royal princes was almost all through the reign engaged therein, and that for many reasons—largely on account of the unwillingness of the Imperial Governors to undertake any energetic action, they being either too lazy or influenced by corrupt motives the war was never allowed to come to a head. A school for the training of soldiers it was, yes, but a worse school could hardly be imagined. Indeed, nothing had a greater share in causing the gradual deterioration of the Moghul soldiery than the never-ending Deccan wars throughout this seventeenth century. There was always something to be done there; unfortunately it never was done. As long as the foe was the Muhammedan of the Deccan but little harm ensued. The Muhammedan Deccan rulers cared as little that the something necessary should be done as the Moghul generals. But when the Mahrattas came on the scene with a very clear comprehension of what should be done and how they should do it, things became very different. A story told by Jahangir as to the cleaning of muskets would seem to indicate that the methods in the army in his time were very primitive. "On the first day of every month, it was the rule with my father to set the example to his Amirs by discharging his musket, and this was followed by the whole train, from the highest dignitary to the lowest stipendiary enrolled in the service of the state, whether cannoner or matchlockman. But this discharge of artillery and musketry never occurred but on that single occasion; unless, of course, in battle. In imitation of the same example I have continued the practice, a shot from my gun Darustandaz being followed by one from every individual in my armies, high or low." Probably, however, the whole is but an instance of the ruler's childishness. He had many experienced officers trained in Akbar's wars who probably saw to the Artillery and guns of the Royal force being kept in order in a very different way from what the royal author suggests.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 274.

Of all the Moghul rulers, none were so fond of camping as Jahangir. All these rulers indeed inherited from their Central Asian ancestors the love of wandering but none of them had it to the same degree as Jahangir. Aurangzeb was a dweller in tents indeed for many years before his death, but this was with a view to warlike operations and not simply through love of wandering. A Moghul

Emperor's camp was much in the nature of a city under canvas. The royal apartments alone occupied many acres of ground and was guarded by a force similar to that which guarded the royal palace at Agra. Everything was in duplicate so that when the Court arrived after a journey, it had not to wait till tents were pitched. These were always on the spot waiting for them. Royal visits in Europe in the middle ages were a means frequently adopted by rulers to impoverish their great subjects; the royal encampments in India ruined as a rule not only the great men but too often also the poor cultivator of the locality. There seem to have been attempts made by the Delhi rulers, even by Jahangir, notably by Sher Shah and Akbar, to minimise these evils, but none who know India are ignorant of the fact that the strictest orders forbidding the hangers on of a camp from plundering the people amongst whom a camp is pitched, and directing the payment of all supplies, are but seldom efficacious, even under the British Raj. Much less so would they be in Moghul times. Occasionally an example, a severe example would be made; but this would do but little to check the evil. A description in the Memoirs as to how Jahangir visited Ahmedabad, even after it be stripped of all exaggeration, will suffice to show what a nuisance a royal progress was. The royal author says "that he visited this city in winter when the trees were bare of blossom, leaf or fruit. The hostess was the daughter of a great nobleman.

"In the course of five days, by employing various artificers of Ahmedabad, to the number of four hundred individuals, in different branches of decoration, she had so effectually changed the appearance of the gardens, by making use of coloured paper and wax, that every tree and shrub seemed as abundantly furnished with leaf, and flower, and fruit, as if in the very freshness and bloom of spring and summer. These included the orange, lemon, peach, pomegranate and apple; and among flowering shrubs, of every species of rose and other garden flowers of every description. So perfect, indeed, was the deception produced, that when I first entered the garden it entirely escaped my recollection that it was no longer the spring of the year, nor the season for fruit, and I unwittingly began to pluck at the fruit and flowers, the artificers having copied the beauties of nature with such surprising truth and accuracy. You might have said, without contradiction, that it was the very fruit and flower you saw, in all its bloom and freshness. The different avenues throughout the garden were at the same time furnished with a variety of tents and canopies, of velvet of the deepest green; so that these, together with the verdure of the sod, contrasted with the variegated and lively tints of the rose and an infinity of other flowers, left altogether such an impression on my mind, as that in the very season of the rose I never contemplated in any place, garden, or otherwise, anything that afforded equal delight to the senses.

From the scene of fascination and enchantment I was not permitted to withdraw myself for three days and as many nights; during which, independently of the delicious repasts on which we feasted, the females of my harem by whom I was accompanied, to the number of four hundred, were each of them presented with a tray of four pieces of cloth of gold of the manufacture of Khorasan, and an ambertchi, or perfume stand, of elaborate workmanship and considerable value; none of which presents could have been estimated separately at less than three hundred to-mauns. What the begum presented to myself on the occasion, in jewels, pieces of the richest fabric for my wardrobe, and horses of the highest value for temper and speed, could not have amounted to a less sum than four lakhs of rupees. In return, I presented her with a chaplet of pearls of the value of five lakhs of rupees, which had been purchased for my own use, and a bulse of rubies worth three lakhs more; I also added one thousand horse to the dignity already possessed by her father. In conclusion, what was thus exhibited in one short week, and in the very depth of winter, for my recreation, by the daughter of Khan Khanan alone, could scarcely have been accomplished by the united genius and skill of any hundred individuals of the other sex, choose them where you may."

When it is remembered that the artisans and labourers, necessary to bring about this result, were all procured by a system of forced labour without payment, the evil of such an entertainment can easily be comprehended.

Of all places that Jahangir visited, there was none as to which he had an affection similar to that which he had for Kashmir. Most lovingly does he describe the beauties of that wonderful country. Akbar had been there before him, but Akbar had ever his main eye on business. Jahangir was what I might term the royal stroller par excellence, and for a stroller what land is comparable to that wonderful valley with its great central river, its hundred and one lesser streams, its picturesque lakes, its glorious woods, and its majestic surrounding wall of mountains. Nature is to be seen there in her loveliest as well as in her grandest forms, and there is no doubt of the reality of Jahangir's love for nature's loveliness, if not for her grandeur. Time after time did he visit the valleys, and all over the valley has he left in the shape of gardens or buildings his mark.

A journey to Kashmir was very different then from what it is now. There were no roads, and the hill side had to be traversed as best one could. And it is to be remembered that Jahangir marched, even though much of the camp was left behind, heavy. Elephants, royal pavilions, harems, all had to be got through. Loss of life both of men and cattle was but too common, but mere loss of life never has troubled a real Moghul. Jahangir's delight at everything, at the flowers, at the trees, at the saffron cultivation, his noticing the ways of living of the Kashmiris, constantly crop out in his Memoirs. And it is not in Kashmir alone that his curiosity as to men and their habits breaks out. He is fond of frequenting the society of Jogis (mendicants) though generally he is disappointed. On one occasion when near a famous place of worship he went to find if possible some fakir from whose society he might derive advantage; but as he adds—* “such a man is as rare as the Philosopher's stone or the Anka; and all that I saw was a small fraternity without any knowledge of God, the sight of whom filled my heart with nothing but regret.” On another occasion he goes and sees a Darvesh at Multan, having heard that on every Friday throughout the year showers of gold mohurs fell on his head. This Darvesh in the first instance took no notice of the Emperor. On being pressed* "at last he condescended to open his mouth, and his first words were these: 'I serve that King who sustains, rambling about the earth, many such kings as thou art.' To this observation the Emperor replied by a request that he would favor him with something that might remind him of the admonitions of the wise and good. 'Strive for the repose of God's creatures committed to thy care,' said he, 'and do thy pleasure, for the virtue of this will be a cover to thy sins. Be not offensive. In the Agents whom thou mayest employ in the different provinces of the empire, be it thy study to reject such as are tyrannical and rapacious. Whilst thou hast power, cherish and respect the gray-beard and the Darvesh.'" He then recited six lines of poetry of which the following is the substance:

---

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 314.

Scoff not at the aged man weighed down by the hand of affliction;

Kindle not the flame which consumes the broken hearted.

Be not at one time a trifle, at another grave.

Art thou full? Give not words of wind.

Be not evil-minded lest thy words be evil;

Be not slanderous if thou wouldst avoid a name of reproach.

This part of the story is well fitted to point a moral or adorn a tale, but Jahangir cannot stay at any moral height for any lapse of time and so after all this advice, we get back to the material again. After evening devotions gold fell from the sky upon the Darvesh's head and this the mendicant proceeds to distribute. Jahangir believed in his miracle worker implicitly; others of his cortége, however, were not so credulous. Amongst others the son of the Khan Dauran had the audacity to turn the whole matter into ridicule. Let us listen to the Emperor's story. 'How childish,' said he, 'in the Emperor, to be magic-blinded by his visit to this canting * Jahangir's Memoirs, pp. 129—130.

Darvesh.' I must here observe, that if I had not received the proof, to which I have referred, of his power of penetrating into the secrets of the mind, the miracle of the golden shower would have found but little credit with me; but the disrespectful language in which this person presumed to express himself could not be entirely overlooked; I therefore commanded that one side of his head and face should be flayed of the skin, and he in that state was led round the encampment, proclamation being made at the same time that such was the punishment which awaited those who dared to apply disrespectful language to him, who was at once their sovereign and benefactor. My severity on this occasion seemed to be further warranted by the fact, that this same son of Khan Dauran, on a previous visit to the Darvesh, had demeaned himself very contemptuously; and the Darvesh resenting such conduct, ventured to tell him that he should not go so far as to take his head, his youth and rashness being beneath his notice, 'but,' said he; 'I will have thee scalped.' And thus was the saying of the Darvesh pointedly fulfilled.' In truth, persons of this description have at all times a claim to be considered as divinities, yet are they not very far apart from the Deity.'* Laughing at Kings has never been a profitable pursuit, and in the East its results are generally disastrous. If the Khan Dauran's son scoffed again, he did so probably privately to himself.

Like all Moghuls Jahangir was passionately fond of hunting. He once ordered a list of the animals to be made which he had killed in the chase. Up to the eleventh year of his reign he states it was calculated that he had killed 28,532, two-thirds of these being either grass-feeding animals or birds. On his reaching the age of fifty he gave up shooting altogether. His Hindu environment was probably responsible for this step.

The main event in Jahangir's life was his marriage with Nur Jahan. This lady was the daughter of a Persian immigrant who had been the Superintendent of Akbar's household. In taking bribes we are told this Persian was very bold and daring, and in after life, when his daughter was Jahangir's chief wife and ruled the Empire, he had plenty of scope in this line. Nur Jahan was married in Akbar's time to Ali Kuli Beg, who got the name of Sher Afghan. On Jahangir's accession, this man was sent to Bengal. It was the story of David and Uriah's wife over again. The royal Governor of Bengal was requested to arrange for a divorce and for Nur Jahan to be sent to Court. The husband naturally enough objected. At a meeting of the Governor and Sher Afghan the latter stabbed the former and was himself immediately cut down. Nur Jahan was sent to Court. First of all she refused to have anything to do with Jahangir whom she rightly considered her husband's murderer, but finally she consented to marry him and from that time she was supreme.

---

* Jahangir's Memoirs, p. 131.

“ Day by day her influence and dignity increased. First of all she received the title of Nur Mahal, 'Light of the harem,' but was afterwards distinguished by that of Nur Jahan Begam, 'Light of the world.' All her relations and connexions were raised to honour and wealth. No grant of lands was conferred upon any woman except under her seal. In addition to giving her the titles other kings bestow, the Emperor granted Nur Jahan the rights of sovereignty and government. Sometimes she would sit on the balcony of her palace, while the nobles would present themselves, and listen to her dictates. Coin was struck in her name, with this superscription: 'By order of the King Jahangir, gold has a hundred splendours added to it by receiving the impression of the name of Nur Jahan, the Queen Begam.' On all farmans also receiving the Imperial signature, the name of 'Nur Jahan, the Queen Begam,' was jointly attached. At last her authority reached such a pass that the King was such only in name. Repeatedly he gave out that he had bestowed the sovereignty on Nur Jahan Begam, and would say, 'I require nothing beyond a sir of wine and half a sir of meat.' It is impossible to describe the beauty and wisdom of the Queen. In any matter, that was presented to her, if a difficulty arose, she immediately solved it. Whoever threw himself upon her protection was preserved from tyranny and oppression; and if ever she learnt that any orphan girl was destitute and friendless, she would bring about her marriage, and give her a wedding portion. It is probable that during her reign no less than 500 orphan girls were thus married and portioned."*

Her father, who was given the name of Itimad-ud-Doulah, became Prime Minister, her brother who was given the name of Itmad Khan became Master of the Ceremonies. The rule of the whole Empire fell into the hands of her relations and herself. From another source than that which I have quoted, we learn that she used actually to sit at the Jharokha, the window where the Moghul Emperors daily seated themselves in order to be seen by their subjects and to administer justice. Jahangir's statement given above is repeated in this authority thus: that he only wanted a bottle of wine and a piece of meat to keep himself merry and that Nur Jahan was the real ruler of the Empire. In spite of all the panegyrics written in her favour, there is but little doubt that her influence on the whole was bad. The finances of the Empire were plundered by her and her relations and the old nobles were disgusted by the authority wielded by this little gang. Afterwards we will see how this was the cause of the great revolt of the reign.

Plague (waba) is mentioned in the Memoirs. Whether this was cholera or the modern plague it is difficult to say, probably the latter. It appeared at different times, coming and then vanishing. There were no railways in those days and thus one great means of propagation was absent.

There were wars in Bengal where the Kings of Arakan gave trouble and where the old Afghan families now and again caused small internal disturbances, but these were of little moment. Far more important were the wars with the Rana of Udaipur which continued for several years. As in the previous wars against this state we have accounts from both sides, the Rajputs representing themselves as ever victorious, whereas the Muhammedan records are largely silent, only recording the final result of the warfare. Umrao Sing was the Rana of Mewar at the time. Rajput story tells us that when called on by Jahangir's emissaries to submit and pay tribute he wavered long, till the chief of Salombra having hurled a brass vessel against a grand mirror adorning the room of the palace in which the deliberations were carried on, shouted 'to horse chiefs, and preserve from infamy the son of Pertap.' De-feated in his first attack Jahangir found a rival to Umrao in his uncle Sugra, whom he established as Rana while encamped by the ruins of Chitor. This, however did not avail, and after seven years of nominal sovereignty Sugra returned to the Imperial Court where he slew himself. The old tactics in Rajput wars were pursued. On the one side the plains were wasted; on the other the Rajputs retiring to their hills, would suddenly burst on Moghul hosts and do them much damage. On one occasion in particular, at the Pass of Khamnor, Prince Parvez with a large army got entangled and had to fly leaving a great part of his army behind. Prince Kharram succeeded Parvez. According to Jahangir he was more successful than his elder brother. In his Autobiography we find the following passage :

---

* " Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 405.

“ Pleasing intelligence arrived of the intention of Rana Umrao Sing to repair and make his obedience to me. My fortunate son Kharram had established my authority and garrisons in divers strongholds of the Rana's country, which owing to the malign influence of the air and water, its barrenness and inaccessibility, it was deemed impossible to bring under subjection; yet from the perpetual overrunning of the country, without regard to the heat or the rains, by my armies, the capture and imprisonment of the wives and children of many of the men of rank of the country, the Rana was at length reduced to acknowledge the despair to which he was driven, and that a further continuance of such distress would be attended with utter ruin, with the choice of captivity or being forced to abandon the country. He therefore determined to make his submission, and sent two of his chiefs, Sup Karan and Haridas Jhala, to my son Kharram, to represent that if he would forgive and take him by the hand, he would pay his respects to him, and would send his eldest son Karan to attend to serve the Emperor, as did other Hindu princes; but that, on account of his years, he would hold himself excused from attending in person. Of these events my son sent a full relation by Shukar Oolah Afzul Khanee.

I was greatly rejoiced at this event happening under my own reign, and I commanded that these, the ancient possessors of the country should not be driven from it. The fact is, Rana Umrao Sing and his ancestors were proud, and confident in the strength and inaccessibility of their mountainous country and its strongholds, and had never beheld a king of Hindustan, nor made submission to any one. I was desirous, in my own fortunate time, the opportunity should not slip my hands; instantly, therefore, on the representation of my son, I forgave the Rana, and sent a friendly firman, that he might rest assured of my protection and care, and imprinted thereon, as a solemn testimony of my sincerity, my "five fingers" (Punja); I also wrote my son, that by any means by which it could be brought about, to treat this illustrious one according to his own heart's wishes.*

Peace was the result. The Rana's grandson, Karan Singh, visited the Imperial Court as the representative of his grandfather and father and was treated with all favour. Tribute—rather a present of elephants, horses and jewels as to which a suitable return was made—was paid by the Rana, he thereby acknowledging himself one of the feudatories of the Empire, but beyond this the Moghuls exacted nothing—neither territory nor the right to kill kine nor any of the hundred and one humiliations commonly demanded by Victors. From this it is very clear that the Rajputs were not badly worsted in the fight; but still all the same from the day of this peace, Mewar's greatness was at an end. In future she was a part of the Empire and her history is that of the Empire.

Long before this war was finished the great Man Sing died. Though he had fifteen hundred wives, so says Jahangir, he left only one surviving son, Bhao Sing, who inherited none of his father's qualities and whose name does not appear amongst the doers of deeds in this or the next reign.

---

* Todd, Vol. 1, pp. 304-305.

Really the greatest Rajput, as judged by action in this reign was Mahabat Khan, the son of the Sugra whom I have named above, who became a convert to Muhammedanism. He is found fighting against the Rajputs in Mewar and greatly distinguishing himself; he is also almost the only Moghul general who accomplished anything in the Deccan and we shall find him later on taking prisoner Jahangir himself.

In the Deccan wars the chief antagonist of the Moghuls was Malik Ambar, an Abyssinian Eunuch. Prince Parvez, one of Jahangir's sons, was for a long time in nominal command of the royal troops; and so for a time was Prince Kharram. But the real leaders of the Moghul troops were great nobles of the Court, the Khan Khanan, son of Bahram Khan, Abdullah Khan and others. In these wars there were always three parties concerned, the Imperial troops, the Adil Shahis of Bijapur and the Nizam Shahis. The capital of these latter Ahmeṇuggur had been taken by Akbar and the dynasty had seemingly come to an end; but still the province was seething with disaffection. Tactics in the Deccan have ever been the same, whether practised by Muhammedans or Mahrattas; the avoiding of regular actions, the wearing out of one's opponents by destroying all local stores, the laying of ambushes, the inducing of the enemy's troops into impassable localities, such have ever been the leading features of a Deccan campaign. And at all these Malik Ambar was a past Master. In 1610 A. D. the Imperial troops marched under the Khan Khanan into the Balaghat—the lands between the Western Ghats and the sea. There "the grain was exhausted and none was to be obtained for money. The men were reduced to distress, and there was no means of carrying the matter further. Horses, camels and other quadrupeds sank exhausted. So he patched up a sort of peace with the enemy, and conducted Sultan Parvez and the army back to Burhanpur."* Complaints against the leader were poured into the Imperial ear. One General, Khan Jahan, wrote and said: "All the disasters have happened through the bad management of Khan Khanan; either confirm him in his command or recall him to Court and appoint me to perform the service. If 30,000 horses are sent as a reinforcement, I will undertake in the course of two years to recover all the Imperial territory from the enemy, to take Kandahar and other fortresses on the frontier and to make Bijapur a part of the Imperial dominions. If I do not accomplish this in the period named, I will never show my face at Court again." Notwithstanding this boaster's promises the Moghuls were closely besieged in Ahmedabad and eventually after a prolonged defence capitulated. In 1612 A. D. other disasters followed. Raja Man Sing was then still alive and out of his experience gave much sound advice, which was not taken by the Muhammedan Nobles who were jointly with the Raja in command of the royal forces. Jealousy between the leaders was everywhere evident in their actions. Abdulla Khan pushed on below the ghats. There Malik Ambar who had in his pay large bodies of Mahrattas harassed him on all sides and he was forced to make a most disgraceful retreat. A saying of one of his chiefs taken prisoner by Malik Ambar survives. To a person attending who said "Victory is in the hands of heaven," he replied "Truly victory is with heaven but the battle is for men."*

---

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 323.

In A. D. 1615 Jahangir's troops obtained a victory over Malik Ambar, but though the royal author is very boastful as to the same, little ground was gained. The enemy, contrary to practice, had fought a pitched battle. The next day all trace of them disappeared. After this Jahangir travelled himself to the Deccan, and at Kambay, saw that wonder of wonders to the Moghuls, the sea. While there he ordered the customs duties to be reduced to two and a half per cent.—a very moderate charge indeed. I need hardly say that goods had to pay much more than this on account of the corruption and greed of the customs' officers. All the travellers in the East agree in grumbling at the local governors, and at the governors of Kambay and Surat in particular, on account of the greed they displayed where merchandise was concerned and of their seizing whatever took their fancy. If report, however, do not lie, what the Moghul rulers in these days did, is much what at some of the Russian ports, officials do at the present day. Trade in spite of this drawback seems to have greatly flourished.

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 323.

About this time Mokarram Khan, an Imperial General, made an important conquest on the Eastern coast, i.e., of the territory of Khurdah. Of all India this Eastern coast has ever kept the most free from Muhammedan influence. The Golkonda Kingdom touched the Bay of Bengal at places; but save for this Hindu Rajas and Hinduism reigned supreme from Cuttack to Cape Comorin until the eighteenth century.

A little later while Prince Kharram was in nominal command in the Deccan, the enemy became so strong as to be able to drive the Imperialists from Burhanpur, A. D. 1621, but reinforcements reaching the Prince, he was able to drive off his opponents and things seemed brighter than they were for years when all of a sudden everything was clouded by his revolt from his father. The cause of this rebellion is said to have been his seizing some of the jagirs of Nur Jahan and Prince Shahriar. There is no doubt that he was not beloved of Nur Jahan, and that under her influence Jahangir assumed a very hostile attitude towards this son of his. In the Memoirs the Emperor naively says—"When Kharram's son was ill, I made a vow that, if God would spare his life, I would never shoot an animal again with my own hand. For all my love of shooting I kept my vow for five years to the present time but now that I was offended with Kharram, I resolved to go out shooting again."*

Kharram determined on the offensive. The Khan Khanan joined him on which the Emperor sententiously remarks:

"Khan Khanan who held the exalted dignity of being my tutor, had now turned rebel, and in the seventieth year of his age had blackened his face with ingratitude. But he was by nature a rebel and traitor. His father, at the close of his days, had acted in the same shameful way towards my revered father. He had but followed the course of his father, and disgraced himself in his old age.—

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 385.

"The wolf's whelp will grow a wolf, E'en though reared with man himself."

The objective of the rebels was Agra. Prince Parvez was the nominal leader of the royal forces, Mahabat Khan being in real command. Without a battle Kharram's forces melted away. Mahabat was profuse of promises, which on the whole were kept and soon the rebellious son found that he had to retreat south of the Nerbudda. There this Prince's first action was to seize the aged Khan Khanan, whose fidelity he doubted. Fearing even to remain in this remote corner of the Imperial territory after staying two or three days at Asir, he, with only three of his wives, his children and a small escort, fled from there, having left the fortress in charge of Gopal, a Rajput. As to the Khan Khanan he took him out of confinement"* and bound him by an oath upon the Koran to be faithful. To give force to the oath and agreement, Kharram took the Khan Khanan into his female apartments, and giving him the privilege of a near relation, presented to him his wives and children, and, with tears and great earnestness, said, "In case of evil falling upon me, I trust myself and the honour of my family to you; something must be done, that I may proceed no further in this wretched and miserable course."†

The Khan Khanan was not long in hesitating what he should do. Within a very few days of Kharram's flight he surrendered to Mahabat Khan, who treated him with all courtesy. The rebellious Prince went to Golkonda territory from whence he proceeded to Orissa and Bengal. There he gathered together a considerable force and managed to get as far as Allahabad. Defeated in action by the ever watchful Mahabat Khan, he was forced again to flee. Betaking himself again to the Deccan, he joined Malik Ambar in an attack on Burhanpur. This nearly succeeded, but not quite. On the arrival of Prince Parvez and Mahabat Khan in relief of this fortress, Kharram made his way to the inaccessible Balaghat. Malik Ambar had been kept in check, in the Deccan, it may be noted while Parvez and Mahabat Khan were fighting at Allahabad, by the troops of the Bijapur Sultan with whom very wisely Mahabat had made an alliance while pursuing Kharram in the first occasion on the Deccan. But this alliance was disastrous to Bijapur, as Malik Ambar in a pitched battle, not far from Ahmednuggur, completely routed the Bijapur troops. All the same his attention being drawn towards his enemy to the South, Malik Ambar effected but little against the Moghuls. Not long after this final victory he died A. D. 1625. In the Memoirs we read "This Ambar was a slave, but an able man. In warfare, in command, in sound judgment, and in administration, he had no rival or equal. He well understood that predatory (kazzaki) warfare, which in the language of the Dakhin is called bargi-giri. He kept down the turbulent spirits of that country, and maintained his exalted position to the end of his life, and closed his career in honour. History records no other instance of an Abyssinian slave arriving at such eminence."*

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 385.

† Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 388.

The chief proof of his greatness was that after his death there ceased to be any vigorous organised opposition to the Moghuls. What there was under the son of Malik Ambar and under the last of the Nizam Shahis was of a very feeble description. When the North-West Deccan again became the scene of warfare, the Mah-rattas and not Muhammedan claimants are the protagonists to the Moghuls.

Before Malik Ambar's death Mahabat Khan had rebelled. He too was driven to this owing to the enmity shown him by Nur Jahan's family. As a Muhammedan author says, speaking of his recall from the Deccan ordered by Jahangir: "This recall was owing to the instigation of Asaf Khan, whose object was to bring him to disgrace, and to deprive him of honour, property, and life."†

* Elliot, Vol. VI, pp. 428—429.

† Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 420.

This Asaf Khan was Nur Jahan's brother. The ostensible cause of the royal displeasure was his betrothing his daughter without the Emperor's consent; the real cause I have stated. On Mahabat's returning from the Deccan he was forbidden to appear at Court. With Mahabat came from that count a band of Rajputs, some thousands strong. The Court was then on tour near the river Jhelum. Mahabat, a Rajput by birth and in heart—was determined not to stand by meekly while his enemies ruined him, and he resolved on receiving the command to enter the Royal encampment to seize the Emperor. Everything favoured his attempt. When he arrived near the Court, a part of the tents and most of the troops had already crossed the river, and only a small retinue attended on the Emperor, who had stayed behind. The story of the seizure is thus told by the Muhammedan author, who is the Annalist of the latter part of the reign: “The writer of this Ikbalnāma at that time held the offices of bakshi and mir-tuzak; therefore he had not gone over the river, but passed the night in the antechamber. After prayers, and saying goodnight to his comrades, he went round to inspect. A cry arose that Mahabat Khan was coming, and the thought occurred to me that perhaps he had gone to the door of the private apartments. Then it was said that he had left the private apartments, and had come to the state apartment, to give expression to his feelings. On reaching the entrance of my ante-room, he enquired how matters stood. When his voice reached my ear, I drew my sword, and went out of the tent. When he saw me, he addressed me by name, and asked after His Majesty. I saw that he had with him about 100 Rajputs on foot, carrying spears and shields, and leading his horse in the midst of them; but the dust prevented me from seeing any one's face distinctly. He hastened to the chief entrance, and I entered the state apartment by a side door. I saw a few men of the guard in the state room, and three or four eunuchs standing at the door of the apartment. Mahabat Khan rode to the door of the state room, and alighted. When he proceeded towards the bathroom, he had about 200 Rajputs with him. I then went forward, and in my simplicity exclaimed: “This presumption and temerity is beyond all rule; if you will wait a minute, I will go on in, and make a report."* He did not trouble himself to answer. When he reached the entrance of the bath-room, his attendants tore down the boards which the door-keepers had put up for security, and threw them into the middle of the state room. The servants who were in attendance on His Majesty informed him of his daring action. The Emperor then came out and took his seat in a palki which was in waiting for him. Mahabat Khan advanced respectfully to the door of the palki, and said "I have assured myself that escape from the malice and implacable hatred of Asaf Khan is impossible, and that I shall be put to death in shame and ignominy. I have therefore boldly and presumptuously thrown myself upon your Majesty's protection. If I deserved death or punishment, give the order that I may suffer it in your presence." The armed Rajputs now flocked in, and surrounded the royal apartments. There was no one with His Majesty but Arab Dast-ghaib and a few other attendants. The violent entrance of that faithless dog had alarmed and enraged His Majesty, so he twice placed his hand on his sword to cleanse the world from the filthy existence of that foul dog. But each time Mansur Badakshi said: "This is a time for fortitude, leave the punishment of this wicked faithless fellow to a just God; a day of retribution will come." His words seemed prudent, so His Majesty restrained himself. In a short time the Rajputs occupied the royal apartments within and without, so that no one but the servants could approach His Majesty. The villain then said: "It is time to go out riding and hunting; let the necessary orders be given as usual, so that your slave may go out in attendance upon you, and it may appear that this bold step has been taken by your Majesty's order." He brought his own horse forward, and urged the Emperor to mount it; but the royal dignity would not permit him to ride upon his horse. So he called for his own horse and ordered his riding garments to be taken into the private apartments. But that shrewd villain would not allow him to go inside.

* Elliot, Vol. VI, pp. 421—423.

They waited a little until the horse was brought. His Majesty then mounted and rode to two arrow-shots distance from the tents. An elephant was brought forward, and Mahabat Khan said that there was a crowd and uproar. His Majesty had therefore better mount the elephant, and so proceed to the hunting ground. The Emperor, without any observation or occupation, mounted the beast. One of the most trusted Rajputs took his seat in front, and two others behind the howda. Mubarak Khan now came forward, and to satisfy him, took a place in the howda with the Emperor. In the confusion, Mubarak had received accidentally a wound in the forehead, from which a good deal of blood had run, and covered his bosom. One of the personal attendants of His Majesty, who had charge of the wine, and carried the royal wine cup in his hand, now came up to the elephant. The Rajputs seized their spears, and with their hands and arms tried to prevent him; but he seized fast hold of the howda, and as there was not room for three persons to sit outside, he supported himself by holding the middle of the howda. After going about half a kos, Gajpat Khan, the master of the elephant stables, brought up the Emperor's own elephant. He was seated in front, and his son behind. Apparently this roused Mahabat Khan's suspicion, and he gave the sign to the Rajputs for killing these two innocent men."

Nur Jahan, however, had got away, and so Mahabat's work was but half done. An attempt to rescue the Emperor by force was made, but failed. The attempt was on the face of it unwise, for if the troops, headed by Asaf Khan, had succeeded in routing Mahabat Khan's Rajputs, doubtless some of these latter would have despatched the Emperor rather than have abandoned him. What force could not do, craft succeeded in doing. Nur Jahan joined the Emperor, treated Mahabat Khan so that he ceased to have any suspicion concerning her and eventually managed to escape with Jahangir to the Punjab Rhotas. Mahabat Khan felt himself outwitted. He had still Asaf Khan in his hands, but thought it wiser to hand him over to Nur Jahan. Thereafter he affected to obey the royal orders which directed him to pursue Kharram who had fled from the Deccan to Sind where he was trying to seize the strong fortress of Thatta. In this, owing to the loyalty of the Governor, he failed, and thinking that the game was now altogether up, determined to proceed to Persia when the news of the death of Prince Parvez his elder brother and his most formidable rival as regards the succession caused him to change his mind. A reconciliation with Mahabat Khan, nominally his pursuer, followed, and he was again in a position to enforce his claims to the throne. But of further fighting there was no need, for shortly after these events his father after a short illness died A.D. 1627. Jahangir's tomb is on the banks of the Ravee at Lahore. Shortly before his death died the last of the great men of Akbar's reign, the Khan Khanan, full of years and in spite of all the stories of his tergiversations, full of honour.

Jahangir's character needs but few words. The decay of the race with him had already begun. In his early life he was wilful to a degree; later on he was ever under some influence or other, and as I have already said, the influence of his wife Nur Jahan, the most enduring of all such influences, does not seem to have been for his good. Boastful, extravagant, drunken, still we feel when we read of him that he was not all bad, that he was good natured, and good intentioned. Fortunately he was the son of his father; his way had been smoothed for him by his father's wisdom in administration; and the broad territories under his sway were accordingly peaceful. On the whole the lands under his rule seem to have been contented and prosperous, and this is what cannot be said of the rule of many abler kings, much abler and more conscientious than Jahangir ever was.

No account of Jahangir's reign would be complete without mention of the European settlements on the coast of Peninsular India and of Sir Thomas Roe's embassy to the Imperial Court. The history of the foundation and growth of these settlements is not within the scope of this work and so a very few words concerning the same will suffice. The Portuguese found their way round the Cape while Baber, still a very young man, was fighting with destiny in Transoxiana. From being merely traders they became a political power under the great Viceroy Albuquerque, who acquired the island of Goa at a time when the Bahmani dynasty only existed as a name and the Adilshahis of Bijapur, within whose territory Goa was, had not yet reached the power to which they afterwards attained. Consequently Goa proved an easy conquest. From this centre the Portuguese stretched their power far and wide over the Indian Ocean, Mozambique on the African coast, Ormuz in the Persian Gulf and Malacca on the Malay peninsula being its out-works. In a very different way from what any piratical ruler had done before, they claimed the lordship of the Indian Ocean. Ships in the Arabian Sea only sailed by their leave. Their pretensions and acts of violence on the sea incensed not only Akbar but other Muhammedan rulers of the East against them, particularly as many from the various countries adjoining the Arabian Sea went by sea rather than by land when on pilgrimage to Mecca. St. Francis Xavier, one of the founders of the Jesuits, came to India, so too did the Spanish Inquisition. Unlike the Eastern Rulers of India in the sixteenth century and particularly unlike Jahangir, who allowed absolute toleration for persons of all religions at a time when such a doctrine was unknown in Europe, the Portuguese were fiercely intolerant. As almost their only converts were their slaves, they soon got themselves thoroughly hated over the East both as brigands and as bigots. Portugal's union with Spain and the war between Spain and Holland led the Dutch to the Eastern seas. On the East coast they founded a flourishing factory at Masulipatam ; in the south they seized the seaports of Ceylon and everywhere became a terror to the Portuguese, who had made the fatal mistake of attempting to maintain an Eastern Empire without ever renewing the material of the same with Western blood. More than a hundred years after the Portuguese and some years after the Dutch, came the English. The port where they first began to trade was Surat in Gujarat belonging to the Delhi Empire. The Portuguese had got ports higher up at Daman and Diu, but neither of these were of much importance, whereas Surat had for many years been the chief port in the Upper part of the Western Coast of India. Besides the perils of the sea, two great difficulties stood in the way of English trade, the determination of the Portuguese to keep out the other European nations and the exactions of local officials. As regards the latter they had recourse to Jahangir himself. First Captain Hawkins, a commander of one of the East India Company's ships, and then afterwards Sir Thomas Roe as ambassador from James I visited the Imperial Court. It is worthy of notice that even by their time, there were quite a number of Europeans to be found inland. Most of these were runaways from boardship or deserters from the Portuguese settlements to be found in the artillery of the native Princes; for even then the Eastern chiefs had a great idea of the Western as a fighting man, but some were of a different type. An eccentric scholar, such as Tom Corryat, was to be found, who had walked the whole way from Aleppo, subsisting on little more than a penny a day; other merchants had come overland from Persia, for the overland route was then in common use, and men such as William Fiach, who was with Captain Hawkins, preferred to return through Cabul rather than round the Cape. Of course, there were also Jesuit missionaries to be found, striving wherever they could to find converts. Both Captain Hawkins and Sir Thomas Roe had to complain of the procrastination, of the vacillation, of what Dickens calls the way not to do it, of Eastern Courts. Sir Thomas Roe has special complaints against Prince Kharram, the future Shah Jahan, on account of his pride and his dislike of Christians, and there is no doubt that he had reason, for with Shah Jahan begins a very different regime as far as toleration was concerned. Both this Capt. Hawkins and Sir Thomas Roe described partly with wonder, and partly with the contempt, that unfamiliarity often generates, the doings at the Imperial Court, the daily appearances of Jahangir at the Jharokha, the animal fights in his presence, the executions, the private levées at night in the Ghusal Khana and the discussion of state matters therein. Sir Thomas Roe in addition tells what hardships he underwent when Jahangir went into camp journeying from Agra to Mandu, how often he found the greatest difficulty in obtaining decent accommodation or even drinking water. In one of his letters he gives this graphic description of the customs of the land, as he understood them.

“ They have no written law. The King by his own word ruleth, and his Governors of Provinces by that authoritie. Once a week he sitteth in judgment patiently, and giveth sentence for crimes, Capitall and Civill. He is every man’s heire when he dyeth, which maketh him rich and the Countrey so evill builded. The great men about him are not borne Noble, but favourites raised : to whom hee giveth (if it be true) wonderfull meanes. They are reckoned by Horses that is to say, Coronels of twelve thousand Horses ; which is the greatest, whereof are four, besides his sonnes and his wife : so descending to twentie horses ; not that any of these are bound to keepe, or raise any at all. But the King assigneth them so much land, as is bound to maintaine so many Horses as a rent, each horse at five and twentie pounds sterling by the yeere, which is an incredible Revenue given away : so many, (that is, almost all, but the Ploughmen, Artificers, and Tradesmen in towns) living upon it. But as they die, and must needs gather, so it returneth to the King like Rivers to the sea, both of those he gave to, and of those that have gained by their owne industry. But for the most part he leaveth the widowes and children their horses, stuffe, and some other stocke : and then putteth them into a Signiory (if the fathers were of six or seven thousand horses) perhaps of a thousand or five hundred : and so setteth them to begin the world anew, and advanceth them as they deserve of him. They all rise by resenting him, which they strive to doe both richly and rarely : some giving a hundred thousand pounds in jewels at a time. He hath one beloved wife among foure, that wholly governeth him. He received lately a present from the King of Bisampore, to obtaine peace, (whose Ambassadour knocked his head three times against the ground) of six and thirty Elephants, of two whereof the chaines and all tackles were of beaten gold, to the weiggth of foure hundred pounds, two of silver, of the same fashion ; the rest of Copper ; fiftie Horses richly furnished and ten Lackes of Rupias in Jewels, great Pearles, and Balasse Rubies. Every Lacke is an hundred thousand Rupias ; every Rupia two shillings sixe pence sterling : so tenne Lackes is a Million of Rupias.

His Territorie is farre greater than the Persians, and almost equall, if not as great as the Turkes. His meanes of money, by revenue, custome of Presents, and inheriting all mens goods, above both. His Countrey lyeth West to Sind, and so stretcheth to Candahar, and to the Mountains of Taurus North. To the east as farre as the utmost parts of Bangala, and the borders of Ganges: and South to Deccan, it is two thousand miles square at the least, but hath many pettie Kings within, that are Tributaries.''*

Jahangir's being weighed on certain days of the year, viz., his birthday and Nouroz, and then weights of gold, silver, and other articles being given away struck Sir Thomas with surprise and also with incredulity, at least as far as the more precious articles were concerned. On one occasion Jahangir tried him by asking whether he would buy two juvenile malefactors condemned to death. Sir Thomas replied that he would pay the money but then would let them free. This he did, but he has a long grumble at the King, who so treated an Ambassador. Still Sir Thomas on the whole obviously liked Jahangir, the latter's facility, good nature and tolerance all making a favourable impression on him. As to his grumbling at having to give presents here, there and everywhere, this has always been the way of the East, and not in India alone; it is not I fancy unknown in the West. Sir Thomas Roe finally obtained permission for English merchants to trade, paying  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. as customs duties. Such a rate compared favourably with most custom rates at the present day, even with the present Indian Government's 5 per cent. Doubtless the Customers, as Sir Thomas Roe calls the Custom Officers, got also their own share, but still trading was and continued to be throughout the country an exceedingly profitable pursuit to the English engaged in it.

---

* Purchas, Vol. IV, p. 437.

SHAH JAHAN—A. D. 1627—1658.

AT the time of Jahangir's death Shah Jahan, who had retraced his steps after having been joined by Mahabat Khan, was in the Deccan. Of all the possible claimants to the succession, there was not one to be compared with him either in ability or experience. This, Asaf Khan, Nur Jahan's brother, the chief minister and greatest man at the time in the state, well knew; and so he declined to listen to his sister's proposal to put Shahriyar, a younger son of Jahangir, on the throne. Nur Jahan's idea was thus to prolong her own reign, but her brother, who saw further than did this beautiful inmate of the Harem, at once perceived the perils of such a course—perils arising on the one hand from the probability that in any conflict for empire Shah Jahan would gain the upper hand and that in consequence he, Asaf Khan, and his family would be utterly ruined, and, on the other hand, that there was no telling as to how long the faineant ruler would be a tool in the hand of Nur Jahan's faction—for the trouble of faineant Kings has ever been the facility with which they are gained over from one interest to another. So Asaf Khan decided to declare for the one capable claimant. Shah Jahan was indeed far away, but a fast runner was immediately sent by the minister to inform him of what had happened. In the meantime Jahangir was interred with all due ceremony at Lahore in a garden which Nur Jahan had laid out, and Dawar Buksh, the son of Khusrao, was brought out of confinement and placed by Asaf Khan on the throne. The historian of the time tells us that Dawar Buksh was loth to believe the wily Persian and only yielded to his and his fellow conspirators' words when they bound themselves by the most stringent oaths, which, however, were not kept nor meant to be kept. We read 'when the nobles and officers of the State became aware, that Asaf Khan had resorted to the stratagem of proclaiming Dawar Buksh, in order to secure the succession of Shah Jahan, and that Dawar was, in fact, a mere sacrificial lamb, they gave their support to Asaf Khan, and did whatever he said. So the Khutba was read in Dawar Buksh's name near Bhimbar, and then they started for Lahore. Asaf Khan was not at ease in respect of Nur Jahan, so he kept watch over her, and would allow no communication with her. The Begum's wish was to raise Shahriyar to the throne. Shahriyar was in Lahore when he heard of the Emperor's death, and urged by his intriguing wife, he assumed the royal title. He seized upon the royal treasure and everything belonging to the State which was in Lahore. To secure troops and supporters, he gave to everyone what he asked for, and in the course of one week he distributed seventy lacs of rupees among the old and young nobles, in the hope of securing his position. Mirza Baisinghar, son of the late Prince Daniyal, on the death of the Emperor, fled to Lahore, and joined Shahriyar. He took command of the forces, and led them over the river.* The fight between Asaf Khan and Shahriyar was but of short duration. Defeated, the latter fled into the female apartments of the late Emperor. From thence he was brought out by a eunuch, bound and blinded. In the meantime Shah Jahan was slowly approaching the capital. When news arrived that he had left the Deccan and was approaching Agra, the farce of Dawar Buksh's sovereignty came to an end. The Khutba was read at Lahore in Shah Jahan's name and Dawar Buksh was thrown into prison. Shortly afterwards orders came to Asaf Khan to put to death all the princes that remained of Akbar's race. Dawar Buksh, his brother Garshasp, the two sons of Prince Daniyal, Akbar's second son, Shahriyar, all were put to death. At length the Delhi sovereignty had copied to the full the custom of Constantinople. In the first century of the Moghul rule, brotherly affection was ever shown by Baber, Humayun and Akbar. Even Jahangir, though greatly provoked, for Khusrao had long been a rival, contented himself with blinding and had fits of tenderness to his son. But from now henceforth, the full blight of Eastern sovereignty, the deadening of all natural affection rules the Delhi Empire in full force. Shah Jahan himself, as we shall afterwards see, suffered by the law of retribution. He steps to the throne through the murder of a brother, of nephews and of cousins ; his reign will come to an end and he will end his days as a captive through the conduct of his own sons. With Jahangir's death we come to an end of royal authors. No longer shall we learn from books written by themselves what sort of men they were or what they wished the world to consider them to be. Henceforth we shall have no such help. With Shah Jahan, indeed, we have help of another sort. Whatever else he was, Shah Jahan was a builder on the grandest scale. The greatest monuments of Moghul architecture in Northern India, the Taj Mahal at Agra and the Juma Musjid at Delhi are his work. It does not concern us here to discuss, how far extraneous, particularly Italian workmanship was employed in the first building, or who actually were the architects of these two wondrous piles. Only a sovereign with boundless resources and with ideas both of the grand and the beautiful, could have directed and superintended these glorious buildings. Muhammedan architecture, as regards both mosques and mausoleums, is largely uniform and one mosque or mausoleum is more or less the type of all others, but in spite of this general uniformity, diversity has ample scope in such creations, and Shah Jahan's great works are incomparably the most striking and the most artistic in India. Inferring from the buildings to the man, we are constrained to pay homage to the grandeur of his conceptions and to his having had the artistic sense strongly developed. Otherwise he was not an amiable character. As far as outer events were concerned, the period 1627 to 1656 was the golden period of Moghul rule. Foreign wars were but few and unimportant, at home there was peace and plenty, and the royal treasury was ever full to overflowing. But in the midst of it all is Shah Jahan, an imperturbable and incomprehensible character, proud as Lucifer as Sir Thomas Roe describes him, cruel to a degree or rather absolutely indifferent to human suffering, and never, as far as history tells us, doing a generous or noble act. A sensualist of the Eastern type, in one matter he shows himself in a pleasant light, i.e., in his great affection to his wife Mumtaz Taj Mahal, the mother of his many children, who, while living, was his constant companion and to whom, when dead, he raised the loveliest of tombs. Taj Mahal, whatever she may have been as regards beauty and personal attraction, was a far inferior character to Nur Jahan, whose niece she was. In cruelty and pride she seems to have been much on a par with Shah Jahan himself. Another of the Emperor's traits, which as years rolled on, became more and more pronounced, was his avarice, until in his latter days we get the repulsive picture of an old decrepit miser of an Emperor, sitting amongst his jewel and money bags and hugging them as dearer than life itself. Altogether when we get to this Emperor, we feel we have left the typical Moghul of the Steppes behind us altogether. No more joviality, no more spontaneity and manliness; instead we have reached the age of automata. Once more in the bigot Emperor, in Aurangzeb, we will find a monarch who, whatever else he was, was essentially a man, but already we have stepped on to the road of decay, out of the breezes into the miasmatic marsh.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VI, p. 436.

Shah Jahan's reign, as I have already pointed out, was one of great prosperity. The Rajputs had become loyal servants of the Empire. Since Jahangir's treaty with the Rana of Mewar, Rajput independence had come to an end. During the remaining days of the Empire they and their rulers are ever to be found fighting as soldiers of the Empire (save indeed when Aurangzeb tries to interfere with their religion and their personal liberties at which time many of them rise in revolt); no longer does the Rana claim to be a sovereign on terms of equality with the ruler at Delhi; all that he asked for, is to be enrolled as one of the great nobles of the Empire and to be treated as a great noble should be treated. As regards the North-Western part of the Empire, Kandahar in this reign becomes finally Persian, but Cabul is and indeed continues to be till well into the eighteenth century an integral part of the Empire, as quiet and as contented as any other part of the Empire.

The slow process of filtration continues in the Deccan. Ahmedabad, without the help of the able Malik Ambar, finally becomes a part of the Empire, and the two remaining Muhammedan states, Bijapur and Golkonda, become weaker and weaker.

The first distant rumbles of the Mahratta troubles that will finally lay the Empire in the dust, are to be heard, but at present all their effect is to weaken the state of Bijapur. The Portuguese power is on the decline and no other European power takes its place. So on every side the position is one of prosperity. Eastern writers are ordinarily not to be trusted on account of their excessive servility; but at the same time the reports of Western travellers, although of the greatest use, must not be taken alone, as giving a full and impartial account of any Eastern Government. Such writers necessarily take more note of extraordinary than of ordinary occurrence. Being absolute strangers, everything to them is strange, and their reports are rather as to what strikes them as most strange than as to the regular course of administration. They indeed do report, and there seems no reason to doubt the correctness of their report, that the Emperor was famed for his justice. Few, however, dared or cared to appeal to him. In a Muhammedan account of his reign we read—“Notwithstanding the great area of the country, complaints were so few that only one day in the week, viz., Wednesday, was fixed upon for the administration of justice; and it was rarely even then that twenty plaintiffs could be found to prefer suits, the number being generally much less. The writer of this historical sketch on more than one occasion, when honoured with an audience of the King, heard His Majesty chide the darogha of the Court that, although so many confidential persons had been appointed to invite plaintiffs, and a day of the week was set apart exclusively with the view of dispensing justice, yet even the small number of twenty plaintiffs could but very seldom be brought into Court. The darogha replied that if he failed to produce only one plaintiff, he would be worthy of punishment.

In short, it was owing to the great solicitude evinced by the King towards the promotion of the national weal and the general tranquillity, that the people were restrained from committing offences against one another and breaking the public peace. But if offenders were discovered, the local authorities used generally to try them on the spot where the offence had been committed according to law, and in concurrence with the law officers, and if any individual, dissatisfied with the decision passed on his case, appealed to the Governor or the diwan, or to the kazi of the suba, the matter was reviewed, and judgment awarded with great care and discrimination, lest it should be mentioned in the presence of the King that justice had not been done. If parties were not satisfied with these decisions, they appealed to the chief diwan, or to the chief kazi on matters of law. These officers instituted further inquiries. With all this care, what cases, except those relating to blood and religion, could become subjects of reference to His Majesty? ”*

The same writer speaks of the general prosperity of the time thus: “The means employed by the King in these happy times to protect and nourish his people; to punish all kinds of oppressive evil-doers; his knowledge on all subjects tending to the welfare of his people; his impressing the same necessity upon the revenue functionaries, and the appointment of honest and intelligent officers in every district; his administration of the country, and calling for and examining annual statements of revenue, in order to ascertain what were the resources of the empire; his showing his royal affection to the people, and expressing his displeasure when necessary; his issuing stringent orders to the officers appointed to the charge of the crown and assigned lands, to promote the increase and welfare of the tenants; his admonishing the disobedient, and constantly directing his generous attention towards the improvement of agriculture and the collection of revenues for the state; all these contributed in a great measure to advance the prosperity of his empire. The pargana, the income of which was three lacs of rupees in the reign of Akbar (whose seat is in the highest heaven) yielded in this happy reign, a revenue of ten lacs. The collections made in some districts, however, fell short of this proportionate increase. The chokladars who, by carefully cultivating their lands, aided in increasing the revenue, received marked consideration, and vice versa.”

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 173.

Notwithstanding the comparative increase in the expenses of the State during this reign, gratuities for the erection of public edifices and other works in progress, and for the paid military service and establishments, such as those maintained in Balkh, Badakshan, and Kandahar, amounted at one disbursement only, to fourteen crores of rupees, and the advances made on account of the edifices only, were two crores and fifty lacs of rupees. From this single instance of expenditure, an idea may be formed as to what the charges must have been under others. Besides in times of war large sums were expended, in addition to fixed salaries and ordinary outlay. In short, the expenditure of former reigns, in comparison with the one in question, was not even in the proportion of one to four; and yet this King, in a short space of time, amassed a treasure which it would have taken several years for his predecessors to accumulate."*

Much of this may be exaggeration. The great expenditure in buildings and their adornment, in the maintenance of the Imperial Court, in the construction of the Peacock throne and in a hundred other ways, must have been at the expense of the general prosperity of the kingdom. Corvées for public works during Shah Jehan's reign must have been as troublesome as was in Egypt the Pharaohs' employment of forced labour to build the Pyramids. But still India is a very big country: a great part of the country is fertile to an extraordinary degree, the persons directly affected by the corvée were in proportion to the total population but small, and provided peace and a certain amount of security, and both existed in this reign, the inhabitants could be comparatively to what they were in other times, well off in spite of all the imperial waste. I have mentioned the Peacock throne. This was of enormous value being said to be worth millions. It was composed largely of gold and precious stones, and was so called inasmuch as each pillar was surmounted by two peacocks. The Koran forbids the representation of human and animal forms, much in the spirit of the second commandment, lest the worshipper should bow down to the created rather than the creator and these peacocks were against the strict letter of Islam, though casuists were to be found who were able to prove that there was nothing in them inconsistent with the precepts of the Prophet. But Shah Jahan had been reared in a harem where Hindu women occupied a large place and was the son of a Hindu mother. Although with him may be said to begin the return of the Delhi rulers towards Islam, still Hindu feelings largely influenced him, and no Koranic precept restrained him from following his own wishes in a matter as to which there might be doubt. The jewel-loving Emperor was not to be kept from displaying his wealth of diamonds, emeralds, rubies and pearls in what he considered the most artistic fashion. The throne remained in existence as long as the Moghul Empire flourished, but in its decay it was seized and broken up by Nadir Shah as we shall see later on.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 171.

The forts at Agra and Delhi—both magnificent specimens of Moghul fort building and with architectural treasures within them, such as the Moti Masjid at Agra and the Diwan-i-Khas at Delhi, were both built in this reign. The present Delhi indeed, known by Muhammedan historians as Shah Jahanabad, was the creation of this sovereign standing as it does North-West of the older Delhi of the time of Baber and Akbar. An old disused canal in the environs constructed by Furukh Shah Khilji, ruler of Delhi, who reigned a few years before the invasion of Timur, which had become blocked up and which had only been partially repaired by Akbar's governor, was cleaned out and made afresh, receiving the appropriate name of Nahr-i-Bihist, the canal of Heaven. To sum up this part of my story, it was in Shah Jahan's reign that Agra and Delhi, as we now know them, really came into existence. No Delhi monarch before or after him has ever equalled him in the matter of building. As to this be, of Indian rulers, rules supreme.

Shah Jahan's reign did not commence without a rebellion. Khan Jahan Lodi, a great Afghan Chief, who had been left behind in the Deccan, entered into an alliance with the last of the Nizam Shahis and surrendered to the latter the Balaghat, he himself marching to Mandu to await events. Summoned to Agra and being deserted by the numerous Rajput chiefs, whose troops formed a considerable part of his army, he resolved to obey and proceeded there. Fearing his arrest, however, he took with him a large body of armed Afghan followers. The usual stories got about of plots to seize him, and although the Emperor sent him a letter on the subject, disavowing any such project, his suspicions were not to be lulled and after short stay off he went. After him followed Khwaja Abul Hassan and a small body of Imperial troops. Overtaking him at Dholpur by the Chambal River, the latter forced on a combat. As the historian pithily says, "The fugitives saw their road of escape was closed, for the waters of the Chambal were before them, and the fire of the avenging sword behind. So they posted themselves in the rugged and difficult ground on the bank of the river and fearing to perish in the waters, they resolved upon battle. The result was that the Imperial troops were held back and Khan Jahan with his Afghans was able to cross. The Khwaja's forces were tired, the fighting had been severe, and so he was able neither to prevent the crossing nor to follow himself. Consequently the fugitives got safe away into the Bundela country A. D. 1628. There he was favoured by the eldest son of the reigning Raja and eventually reached the Deccan. Having reached that country he joined with the forces of the last of the Nizam Shah Dynasty. That Prince had become practically a robber on a large scale, holding no certain territory, but ever on the look-out for loot and plunder. Most of his Chief Lieutenants were Mahratta Hindus. Khan Jahan Lodi seems to have been more sought after by the Imperial troops than this Nizam Shahi Prince. Cut off by an energetic General, Khan Jahan only escaped with the loss of one of his sons and his equipage. Then separating from the Deccan prince, he determined to do what other rebels had done before him, i.e., raise the Punjab. He was never able, however, to reach that country. The Bundelas now turned round on him and hindered his progress. Defeated, losing in fight more sons and his chief supporters, at last it seemed clear to him that he could not escape. Thereupon he met his end with dignity and calmness—A. D. 1631."* The story is thus told: "Khan Jahan was much afflicted at the loss of sons and faithful followers. All hope of escape was cut off; he told his followers that he was weary of life, that he had reached the end of his career, and there was no longer any means of deliverance for him; he desired, therefore, that every man should make off as best he could. A few determined to stand by him till the last, but many fled. The advanced forces of the royal army under Madhu Singh now came up. Khan Jahan, with his son Aziz, who was the dearest of all, and Aimal and the Afghans who remained constant, placed their two remaining elephants in front, and advanced to meet Muzaffar Khan. They made their charge, and when Khan Jahan found that they were determined to take him, he alighted from his horse and fought desperately. In the midst of the struggle Madhu Singh pierced him with a spear, and before Muzaffar Khan could come up the brave fellows cut Khan Jahan, his dear son Aziz, and Aimal, to pieces."* The title of Khan Jahan was conferred on his conqueror Muzaffar Khan. After his death, until the end of the reign and the war between Shah Jahan's sons, no rebellion of any consequence disturbed again the Empire's tranquillity.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 9.

All this time and indeed all through the reign war with the Deccan princes went on. In its course the Nizam Shahi Dynasty came to an end, the country over which they governed coming almost entirely under the Imperial authority at least in name (Bijapur acquired a small part) and the kingdom of Golkonda and Bijapur were much weakened."

In 1629 A. D. we read for the first time of an actual invasion of the Golkonda territory. This stretched up the Eastern coast of India as far North almost as Orissa. Bakir Khan, the Imperial governor of this province, attacked in the cold weather of this year the fortress Mansurgarh which was built commanding a pass through the Orissa hills. In spite of its name which means the port of victory, the garrison, on an assault being imminent, took grass between their teeth as is the manner of that country, so says the chronicler, and begged for quarter. This was the commencement of the encroachment of the Delhi government on the Golkonda

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 21.

Kingdom. Another general in the same year, Nasiri Khan, reduced the fortress of Kandahar in Telingana, then the North-Eastern Province of the Kutb Shahi Kingdom (which must not be confounded with the Afghan Kandahar). More important, however, were the wars against the Bijapur Adil Shahis and the wandering Nizam Shahis. Azam Khan was at this time (1630-40) the imperial general. A minority in Bijapur caused the real power to fall into the hands of a slave, Daulat, originally a minstrel, ennobled by the last King under the name of Daulat Khan, and now the chief of the state. He took to himself the title of Khawas Khan. The real head of the Government was a Brahmin Mahratta, Murari Pundit. A siege by the Imperialists of the strong fort of Parenda failed owing to the inability of the besieging army to obtain fodder. In this year there was a most disastrous famine in the Deccan. The Muhammedan historian tells its story thus:—

“During the past year no rain had fallen in the territories of the Balaghat, and the drought had been especially severe about Daulatabad. In the present year also there had been a deficiency in the bordering countries, and a total want in the Dakhin and Gujarat. The inhabitants of these two countries were reduced to the direst extremities. Life was offered for a loaf, but none would buy; rank was to be sold for a cake, but none cared for it; the ever-bounteous hand was now stretched out to beg for food; and the feet which had always trodden the way of contentment walked about only in search of sustenance. For a long time dog’s flesh was sold for goat’s flesh, and the pounded bones of the dead were mixed with flour and sold. When this was discovered, the sellers were brought to justice. Destitution at length reached such a pitch that men began to devour each other, and the flesh of a son was preferred to his love. The numbers of the dying caused obstructions in the roads, and every man whose dire sufferings did not terminate in death and who retained the power to move wandered off to the towns and villages of other countries. Those lands which had been famous for their fertility and plenty now retained no trace of productiveness.”*

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 24.

In those days as well as now there were methods of famine relief, the giving away of food and money and the lessening of taxation.

“The Emperor in his gracious kindness and bounty directed the officials of Burhanpur, Ahmedabad, and the country of Surat, to establish soup kitchens, or alms-houses, such as are called langar in the language of Hindustan, for the benefit of the poor and destitute. Every day sufficient soup and bread was prepared to satisfy the wants of the hungry. It was further ordered that so long as His Majesty remained at Burhanpur 5,000 rupees should be distributed among the deserving poor every Monday, that day being distinguished above all others as the day of the Emperor's accession to the throne. Thus, on twenty Mondays, one lac of rupees was given away in charity. Ahmedabad had suffered more severely than any other place, and so His Majesty ordered the officials to distribute 50,000 rupees among the famine-stricken people. Want of rain and dearness of grain had caused great distress in many other countries. So under the directions of the wise and generous Emperor taxes amounting to nearly seventy lacs of rupees were remitted by the revenue officers—a sum amounting to nearly eighty krons of dams, and amounting to one-eleventh part of the whole revenue. When such remissions were made from the exchequer, it may be conceived how great were the reductions made by the nobles who held jagirs and mansabs.”*

In A. D. 1631 two matters of importance happened. Malik Ambar's son, Fath Khan seized the nominal ruler of the Nizam Shahis and placed him in confinement, and Azam Khan having taken Kulbarga laid siege to Bijapur itself. The consequence was that the Adil Shahi ruler offered to make terms. It was proposed that he should send tribute to the value of forty lakhs of rupees in jewels, valuable elephants and money, and should promise to remain ever faithful to Shah Jahan whom he was to recognize as his master. It turned out, however, that these proposals were being made simply with a view of gaining time. In this they were successful. All the country had been wasted by the Bijapur troops before the arrival of the Imperialists. No food or fodder was to be had. As the historian puts it "man and beast were sinking," and so there was nothing but a retreat. This they made, plundering wherever they went.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII. p. 24.

In A. D. 1632 Fath Khan submitted to the Emperor and was awarded certain districts in the old Nizam Shahi Kingdom, including the town of Daulatabad. This offended Sahuji, the Mahratta, the father of the famous Sivaji, and so with a band of Adil Shahis this chieftain advanced against Daulatabad. Fath Khan, whose only idea seems to have been to get what he could, on promises of cash made by the Bijapur general and of the retention by him of the fortress, went back from his submission to the Emperor and began to fortify himself for a siege. Against him thereupon came the Khan Khanan (Mahabat Khan) and his son who had obtained the title of Khan Zaman. Trenches were formed, mines were charged, and after a fierce conflict the outer works were carried. It is stated that the Khan Khanan, a true Rajput, wished to head the storming party himself and was with great difficulty dissuaded. After the outer fortress two more remained to be carried, the Mahakot and the Kalikot. The latter was carried by a storming party. Then at last Fath Khan offered to surrender.

He was granted favourable terms, being allowed to retire with his family and property and being granted carriage for his goods and a large sum in cash. Such terms show us the Rajput nature in the Khan Khanan again. And so Daulatabad came again into the imperial possession. The historian of the time thus describes the fort :—"The old name of the fortress of Daulatabad was Deo-gir, or Dharagar. It stands upon a rock which towers to the sky. In circumference it measures 5,000 legal gaz, and the rock all round is scarped so carefully, from the base of the fort to the level of the water, that a snake or an ant would ascend it with difficulty. Around it there is a moat forty legal yards (zara) in width, and thirty in depth, cut into the solid rock. In the heart of the rock there is a dark and tortuous passage, like the ascent of a minaret, and a light is required there in broad daylight. The steps are cut in the rock itself, and the bottom is closed by an iron gate. It is by this road and way that the fortress is entered.

By the passage a large iron brazier had been constructed, which, when necessary, could be placed in the middle of it, and a fire being kindled in this brazier, its heat would effectually prevent all progress. The ordinary means of besieging a fort by mines, sabats, etc., are of no avail against it."* Fath Khan, we are told, was subsequently sent along with the Nizam Shah, faineant King, to Agra. The former was pardoned—this was doubtless on account of the promises of the Khan Khanan—the latter sent to the Gwalior state prison.

Soon after the great Khan Khanan died, A. D. 1633. The war still lingered on; another Nizam Shahi faineant ruler was set up, but the Ahmednuggur Kingdom had come to its final end. Henceforth it ceased even to be a name. In a treaty of peace concluded with Bijapur in A. D. 1635 Shah Jahan confirmed to the ruler of that state whatever territory he had seized from the Nizam Shah State as well as the whole of the Konkan, a part of which had once partially belonged to the ruler of Ahmedabad.

A little before these events the Portuguese Factory at Hugli came to a violent end. Shah Jahan unlike Jahangir hated Christians and his favourite wife Taj Mahal hated them if anything more than her husband. They had not helped Shah Jahan in his days of revolt, on the other hand, they had always been friendly with his father. Now that his day of triumph was come, he was determined to strike and to strike hard. Most of the European factories being on the sea-coast were hard to reach, but the Portuguese factory of Hugli was well within his power. No sea-going vessels were necessary for its capture. It was built two miles above the mart of Satgam and complaints were made to the Emperor that the Portuguese had fortified themselves in their factory and had driven away the trade from Satgam. Further complaints were that the Portuguese had proselytised at a great rate and sent numbers of the converts off in ships to Europe—presumably to work as slaves. Our historian remarks: "In the hope of an everlasting reward, but in reality of an exquisite torture.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 41.

they consoled themselves with the profits of their trade for the loss of rent which arose from the removal of the cultivators. These hateful practices were not confined to the lands they occupied, but they seized and carried off every one they could lay their hands upon along the sides of the river."* Shah Jahan, we are told, had noticed all this before he came to the throne. In reality, when on his wanderings during his rebel days, the Portuguese had declined to give him and his wife shelter, and consequently he had determined on revenge. No sooner was he secured on the throne than he gave to Karim Khan, the Governor of Bengal, the necessary orders. A flotilla was constructed; false stories were put about as to its destination; the Hugli has an endless network of offshoots down which large boats can proceed, which offshoots communicate with the river lower down, and so it happened that Hugli was cut off from the sea before the Portuguese knew that the Moghuls were about to attack them. When they did learn this, they held out bravely. It took months before the place was taken. The final capture was brought about by draining certain water-courses which the Portuguese used for their boats. One great ship was blown up by its defenders (for to Hugli in those days large ships could come); so were many smaller vessels; many of the defendants were drowned. The rest were taken prisoners and sent to Agra. Before they reached there Taj Mahal was dead. It was reported that it was fortunate for them that she was so, as she had vowed to have them all killed. In any case their lot was not a happy one. The younger women were taken into the Emperor's and the chief nobles' harems. Others had their choice of Islam or death. With this tragedy ended Portuguese territorial rule in Bengal. About sixty years more and the English will found another city, Calcutta—destined after many vicissitudes to become the capital of their Indian Empire.

Taj Mahal, as I have already said, was dead before Hugli was taken, she having survived Shah Jahan's accession to the throne for only three years. All this Emperor's sons, who at the end of his reign contended for the throne were hers. In all she had eight sons and six daughters, quite a record for one wife to bear to an Eastern ruler. Henceforth Shah Jahan gave himself up to the ordinary courses of an Eastern King and we no longer read of any one woman having control over him. An exception has to be made, however, as regards one of his daughters, Begam Sahiba, with whom the scandalous chronicles of the time say that in latter days his relations were incestuous. Certain it was that she had great authority in court, that countries, governors, strangers, foreigners, everyone who wanted to obtain any favour from the Court found it necessary to win her favour by the payment of a large sum of money. It was a little after Taj Mahal's death that Shah Jahan publicly showed his bigotry by ordering that all the temples throughout his Empire and particularly in Benares, which had been begun, but were unfinished, should be thrown down. Such an order could only very partially be carried out, but the fact of such an order being given, shows that we are departing from Akbar's days and ways. In the next reign the regression to intolerance will become complete.

---

Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 32.

The Bundelas gave Shah Jahan much trouble. I have already related how a prince of this tribe had aided Khan Jahan Lodi in his escape through their country, and how afterwards when he returned, they had obstructed him. This race living on the South and Western side of the Ganges and out of the main line of traffic and of civilization along the river, amidst forests and hills, were largely addicted to robbery. They were Hindus of a sort, having Rajput names, but their Hinduism would hardly have been acknowledged in Benares or Udaipur. Their chief, Jajhar Sing, had been sent by Shah Jahan on service to the Deccan. Leaving his son with the Imperial troops there, he returned home and signaled his home coming by attacking a neighbouring Zemindar, Bim Narain, whom he treacherously killed and whose fort Chouragarh, a Central Indian fortress of considerable strength, he seized. On this being known at court, he was ordered to give up a part of his booty. This he determined not to do. Summoning his son to escape from the Imperial forces in the South, he broke out in open rebellion. The son, Bikramjit, with great difficulty, managed to reach home, having been pursued and having lost in a fight the greater number of his followers. Under the nominal command of Prince Aurangzeb, but really under Khan Dauran, the royal army entered the Bundelkund forests. Everywhere there was opposition, more indeed caused by nature than by the Bundelas themselves. At one fort Dhamuni which the royal troops carried by storm, a gunpowder explosion destroyed a large number of the attacking forces. At last, however, the country was subdued, Chouragarh was abandoned, and Jajhar and his troops made a bolt, carrying with them his treasure, for the Golkonda kingdom. Pursuit was close. When overtaken we are told that the fugitives had not even time to perform the Jaubar rites. Rani Parbati, the chief wife of the leader, was left on the ground badly wounded; other of the women were killed by the fugitives. Many of the Bundelas were slain, a son and a grandson of Jajhar escaped only to fall into the hands of some Gonds, an aboriginal hunting tribe of the Western Vindhya who put them cruelly to death. Two sons managed to reach Golkonda, but the Kutb Shahi Prince ruling there thought it no part of his duty to afford a refuge to Kafirs of this sort, and surrendered them to the Imperial authorities, who sent them to Court. On reaching there they were offered the choice of Islam or death, and in choosing the latter were in the choice language of the Muhammedan historian sent to hell. The Bundelas did not give the Imperial authorities very much trouble for many a long year. In A. D. 1637 we read of expeditions to Kuch Behar and Assam. Thick jungle had not prevented the earlier Aryans from crossing in numbers the Kosi river and settling themselves beyond in Northern Bengal, but modern Kuch Behar and the country round it had hardly been troubled by the Muhammedan conquerors, who in Bengal and near it had kept very much to the neighbourhood of the great rivers. The Kuch Behar ruler Lachmi Narain submitted to the Imperial rule, and from this time his lands became a part of the Empire. With Assam, however, the case was different, an expedition, a victory, the destruction of some forts, such seems to have been all the work done. The Assam rulers did not become feudatories.

Far more important were the events which happened in this reign at Kandahar and in Badakshan. Kandahar had become Moghul in the reign of Akbar. In Jahangir's reign it was seized by the Persians; Shah Jahan, desiring to recover it, sent an emissary to Ali Mardan Khan, the Persian Governor, with instructions to try and bring about its surrender. Ali Mardan Khan was seduced from his allegiance by this man's gifts and promises, and the place became for a short time a part of the Empire of Shah Jahan. In the year A. D. 1648 it fell again into the hands of the Persians, who under their King Akbar the Great had marched against it and the neighbouring fortresses of Bast and Zamindawar. At places these latter forts stood out stoutly for some time; but Daulat Khan, the Governor of Kandahar, as soon as he found himself really pressed, does not seem to have thought a moment as to whether he could make a successful defence till succour came, but only how he could make terms for himself. As soon as the snow was off the ground the Imperial Forces besieged Kandahar from which place Abbas had retired, only leaving a garrison. After a three and-a-half years' siege, finding they had made no impression in the place and that food was growing scarce in their camp, they abandoned the undertaking. The Imperial Commander was Prince Aurangzeb. I might here say that Ali Mardan Khan on his arrival in India was amply rewarded by Shah Jahan and was given the highest position in the State. The Ravi Canal near Lahore was his work. He seems to have been a personal friend of the Emperor's and the latter mourned much his death which took place shortly before the brothers' war at the end of the reign. In Badakshan also there was fighting. This country was for a long time debateable land. The ruler Nazar Mahammad had attacked Cabul and had been driven back. In revenge for this an Imperial army under Prince Murad Buksh, one of the Emperor's sons, marched into the country. Badakshan is like many other hill countries, easy to overrun, difficult to retain. Prince Murad wished to return; so did his chief officers; thereupon the Emperor recalled Murad in disgrace and appointed Sadulla Khan as his temporary successor until the arrival of Prince Aurangzeb, the new Governor, A. D. 1646. This Prince reported that, owing to the dearth of provisions and the discontent of the troops, a return was advisable. So a treaty was entered into with Nazar Mahammad restoring the country to him, and the troops were ordered to return to Cabul. This they did after much difficulty. Marauders hung everywhere on their rear; stragglers were murdered; treasure had to be abandoned in the snow, and finally after a loss as estimated by the Muhammedan historian of 5,000 men, a remnant of the army managed to reach Cabul in safety. In future Badakshan is not a scene of Moghul warfare.

In all this fighting at Kandahar and in Badakshan the Rajputs seem to have been foremost. The real mainstay of the military power of the Delhi Kingdom had become its Rajput contingent. A wonderful instance is this of what has so often happened; wise management turning foes into the best of friends. The Rajput, though he claimed never to have yielded to the Moghul sword, had been conquered by Akbar's and Jahangir's generosity. They became true to the Empire, devoting to it the same loyalty of service that formerly they had paid to their local chiefs.

Little Tibet also was raided by the Imperial Army A. D. 1646. Lying next to Kashmir, where Shah Jahan after the manner of his father spent several summers, in spite of its secluded position, it excited the greed of the Emperor; but the effects of this raid were by no means permanent and it really never became a part of the Delhi Empire. A campaign there, much as a campaign in Greater Tibet, is only feasible during a very few summer months, and in the absence of roads winter communication is impossible.

The Deccan wars continued off and on during the whole of the reign. Every now and again we read of an Imperial army marching into Bijapur territory; sometimes it is in pursuit of Sahu, who was ever trying to carve out some sort of principality for himself on the borderland between the Ahmudnuggur Kingdom and that of Bijapur, sometimes it is attacking the Bijapur state itself, but the story is ever monotonously the same. After a time the hot weather or rains prevent further action, the food supplies are exhausted, a nominal submission is tendered and accepted and a hurried retreat accompanied by much suffering, leaves the Imperial troops where they were before the opening of the campaign. With Golkonda, till towards the conclusion of the reign, the wars were of but little importance; they only touched the outskirts of the Golkonda kingdom and can hardly by any force of language be termed anything more than border raids.

In the meantime the King is building, ever building. His Court at Agra, his Harem, became the most magnificent ever seen in India. Stories are told that bazaars were held within this Harem at which the wives of the great Amirs attended. These noblemen would naturally be profoundly disgusted at this; and it may help to explain how at the end of the reign, when Shah Jahan most wanted help, no help came. As the King gets older and older his passion for hoarding becomes greater and greater; and accordingly the latter years of his reign are less notable for great public works save for buildings than his earlier. In A. D. 1650 he was excused the Ramazan fast.

Muhammedans as a rule fast to a much greater age than sixty; and it is only in the case of very bad health that they omit this practice. Old age, save extreme, seldom interferes. But Shah Jahan was broken down. His Kingdom is for years almost without annals, a sign of things going well, but for this the broad administrative rules laid down by Akbar are more to be thanked, than the personal supervision of the King. At last he breaks down utterly, and this breakdown is the occasion of the most violent civil war that ever took place in the annals of Muhammedan India. Before entering into its story, a description of the main actors is necessary.

Shah Jahan had four sons—Dara Shikoh, Shujah, Aurangzeb, and Murad Buksh who grew up to manhood. I have named them in their order of age. Of them the eldest, Dara Shikoh, generally stayed with his father. He had the reputation of being in religious matters much of the same mind as his great grandfather Akbar. Muhammedan Ulema lamented his laxity of belief and practice, and the toleration which he showed towards the professors of other religions. The Jesuit priests had hopes that he might turn a Christian. He seems not to have been over-careful in what he said or did of other people's susceptibilities, and to have also been inclined to be too free with his tongue and to have utterly despised all advice. Prince Shujah, the second son, had a much less distinctive character. Personally he was brave and seems to have been a capable Governor in Bengal; but his individuality does not come out prominently in the histories of the time. He affected Shiism for the reason, as Bernier suggests, that he might thereby gain the favour of the Persians, who were always very strong at court. Prince Aurangzeb, the third son, who subsequently became Emperor, on the other hand, stands out very distinctly. I shall subsequently, in the part of this book which relates to his reign, try to depict his character in detail. At present all I need say is, that he was a man of the most rigid Sunni orthodoxy, and of the highest capacity, that he knew how to keep his mouth shut and that personally he was inclined to asceticism. Murad Buksh, the youngest, was a regular swash-buckler, one glorying in his physical strength and in the attributes he had in common with an animal. Such were the four brothers about to fight for the Empire.

At the time to which we have got, A. D. 1657, Dara Shikoh was at Agra, Shujah in Bengal, Murad in Gujarat and Aurangzeb in the Deccan. The three last were Viceroys of the various provinces in which they were resident; Dara Shikoh, though nominally the Viceroy of Cabul, was really carrying on at Agra as his father's deputy the central Government.

In the two years preceding events had happened in the Deccan which had a profound influence on the coming civil war. My readers have been told that during this reign off and on there were hostilities with Golkonda, but that these were of a very minor character. In this state a Persian Mir Jumla had little by little, by intrigue and gifts, risen from a subordinate position to that of Chief Minister and had become enormously rich by reason of his successfully farming the diamond mines of the State. As Chief Minister he extended the State's boundaries by his conquests along the Eastern coast, particularly in the Carnatic where Tavernier, a French diamond merchant, met him. Before his time the Muhammedans had practically no hold over this part of India.

The King finally considered him too powerful a subject and determined to deprive him alike of his power and his wealth. To this he was largely urged by scandalous reports as to this Minister's relations with the Royal mother. Mir Jumla, however, was too quick for the King, and suspecting the latter's motives escaped to Moghul territory. There he was hospitably received and through the influence of Prince Aurangzeb, whose fast friend he became, was granted a position of high rank amongst the Moghul nobility. Directions were sent to the Golkonda King to allow Mir Jumla's son and dependants to follow him. The King showed no inclination to comply. Though Mir Jumla had escaped, much of his wealth was left behind and the King had no intention of giving this up. Prince Aurangzeb, on receiving a negative reply, was prompt in action. His son, Prince Mahammad Sultan, was sent with an advance force to seize Golkonda, if possible by surprise. The troops, which had been warring on the Bijapur frontier, were ordered to join Prince Aurangzeb as soon as possible; and he, with these troops and his own men, was to march forward to support Mahammad Sultan. The King of Golkonda was completely surprised. Mir Jumla's son was released by the King. They met Mahammad Sultan about 25 miles from Haidarabad (which is close to Golkonda). This town was taken almost without a struggle. Presents showered in from the Golkonda King with requests for terms, but all the time messages were being sent to the Adil Shahi King for help. It needed a sharp fight and the arrival of the main army to bring the King to terms. A crore of rupees (ten million), jewellery, elephants, and the marriage of the King's daughter to Mahammad Sultan, such were the price of peace. Mir Jumla's family rejoined him and hence his fortunes were bound up with those of Aurangzeb. The latter had the title of Muazzam Khan conferred on the wily Persian, who passed for good into the Imperial service. Shortly after these events the ruler of Bijapur died, and consequently in A. D. 1657 when the civil war began, there was no foe with whom to contend in the Deccan. On the other hand, the power of Aurangzeb had been augmented by the great wealth of Mir Jumla, which was at his service, and his reputation had been enhanced by his recent successes. In this year Shah Jahan fell very sick. It is said that his illness was caused by strong aphrodisiacs. In any case he did not appear for a time at the Jharokha and the word spread everywhere that he was dead. Even when it was learnt that he was not dead, it was everywhere believed that his illness was mortal. Dara Shikoh's actions seemed to indicate this. Posts were stopped; every step was taken to prevent any information of what had happened in Agra getting abroad; troops were called together; arms were manufactured and everything pointed to big events. Throughout Hindustan it was known that in case of Shah Jahan's death there would be no quiet succession. Primogeniture had not established itself as the rule governing the Delhi throne. Each brother was prepared to fight for the crown; there was no fraternal affection amongst the brothers to act as a restraining force; and there was no overwhelming influence which could bring about a quiet succession. As it happened there was no waiting for the Emperor's death; he recovered to live eight years longer, for the greater part of the time a prisoner in the fort he had built; the rumour of his death was sufficient to precipitate the contest. We are indebted to a French physician, Bernier, who resided for some years after Aurangzeb's succession in the Imperial Court, to an account of the civil war that ensued. By this time Muhammedan historians have, in studying the art of flattery, largely lost the art of graphic writing; and there is a strong contrast between the life-like descriptions we get from the sixteenth century historians and the correct and polished phrases of the historians of this and the succeeding times; from these latter it is difficult to gain any life-like delineation either of the events or the actors therein. Hence Bernier is doubly welcome. The most reliable Muhammedan authority is Khafi Khan who wrote many years afterwards. In the main his and Bernier's accounts tally.

The first to move was Shujah from Bengal. He got as far as Benares. Here he was attacked by Sulaiman Shikoh, Dara Shikoh's eldest son, with an army of which the main strength was the Rajput contingent under Raja Jai Singh. Shujah was taken by surprise, his troops were cut in pieces, and he was forced to retreat to Bengal. Stories were about that Raja Jai Singh could easily have captured Shujah but purposely forbore to do so. Probably there was considerable truth in this. What to do with him would have been the difficulty. To give him over to Dara would have been to cause himself to be detested by the father. We find that throughout this war no one of the leading generals was willing to burn his boats. They ever behaved so that if fortune did not favour the brother whose cause they espoused, they could join a second brother with a hope of being accepted by him.

After Shujah came Murad. With his Gujarat troops he besieged Surat and after a considerable siege took it. His hopes of finding great treasure therein were, it is said, disappointed. Anyhow he found enough to pay his soldiers and sufficient to keep them together. In the meanwhile a comedy had been played between Mir Junda and Aurangzeb. The former was the richest man of the time, and the troops which he led, were in comparison with the other soldiers of the day, in a state of exceedingly good discipline. His co-operation was necessary for Aurangzeb's success. The latter could not possibly move North and leave him behind in the Deccan with a force which might act in a manner hostile towards him. At the same time Mir Jumla's family were at Agra. They had gone there, really had been sent there, as hostages for Mir Jumla's conduct. If he openly joined Aurangzeb, it was to be feared that they would get but short shrift. Accordingly Aurangzeb suggested that Mir Jumla should consent to his being thrown into prison, so that Dara and Shah Jahan might believe that he continued faithful to the old Emperor and was opposed to the action of Aurangzeb. The rest of the story is told by Bernier thus: "Aureng-Zebe being no sooner gone, but the great Master of the Artillery was seen to approach with some fierceness to the Mir, and to command him in the name of Aureng-Zebe to follow him, locking him up in a chamber, and there giving him very good words, whilst all the soldiery, that Aureng-Zebe had thereabout, went to their Arms. The report of the detention of Mir Jumla was soon spread, but a great tumult arose; and those, whom he had brought along with him, although astonished, yet put themselves into a posture of rescuing him, and with their Swords drawn ran to force the Guards, and the Gate of his Prison; which was easy for them to do: For Aureng-Zebe had not with him sufficient troops to make good so bold an Enterprize; the only name of Mir Jumla made all tremble."

The whole commotion was, however, easily quieted by the chief officers of Mir Jumla's army, who had been informed of the inwardness of the transaction and his troops joined those of Aurangzeb. Aurangzeb in the meantime had been in communication with Murad.

In his letters he wrote: "I have not the slightest liking for or wish to take any part in the government of this deceitful and unstable world, my only desire is that I may make the pilgrimage to the temple of God. But whatever course you have resolved upon in opposition to the good-for-nothing and unjust conduct of our disgraceful brother (birada-i-be-shukoh), you may consider me your sincere friend and ally. Our revered father is still alive, and I think that we two brothers should devote ourselves to his service, and to the punishment of the wilfulness of that haughty one and the presumption and conceit of that apostate. If it be possible, and we are permitted to see our father again, after exerting ourselves to put down that strife and insurrection, we will entreat the King to forgive the faults of our brother, who has involuntarily been impelled to such a course of action. After setting the government in order, and punishing the enemies of the State, our brother must be reclaimed, and he must go to pay a visit to the holy temple. It is important that you should allow of no delay in your movements, but should march at once to chastise that presumptuous infidel Jeswant Singh. You must consider me as having arrived on your side of the Nerbudda, and must look upon my numerous army and powerful artillery as the means of securing your victory. You must know that I make the Word of God my bail for this treaty and compact, and you must by all means banish suspicion from your mind."*

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 217.

Murad was won over by these fine words and the two princes' armies combined at Berhampur on their Northern march. After a month's delay they set out from this town and met no opposition until they were in the neighbourhood of Oojein where they fell in with Dara's army commanded by Kasim Khan and Raja Jeswant Singh. The former, it was universally believed, hated Dara. A great Noble about the Court, his wives had been at Shah Jahan's bazaars, and so he did not love the father either. Before the battle Aurangzeb tried negotiations. He sent to Jeswant Singh a Brahmin "called Kab, who had a great reputation as a Hindi poet and master of language, to the Raja with this message: 'My desire is to visit my father'. I have no desire for war. It is therefore desirable that you should either accompany me, or keep away from my route, so that no conflict may arise, or blood be shed.'"

No reply came and both sides prepared for battle. There is little doubt that Kasim Khan's troops and he himself both behaved very badly. Jeswant Singh's Rajputs, however, fought magnificently and were cut to pieces. Only five or six hundred of them escaped. Amongst them was the Raja. When he reached home, his wife refused to receive him. She declined to accept his excuses, that he had done his best. A Rajput, she said, especially a Rajput of his lineage, should conquer or die. Then she directed a funeral pyre to be made and declared she would ascend it as a Sati, as her husband was already dead. Only after many days did she consent to receive the defeated Raja.

The Battle of Oojein took place in March 1658. In spite of the hot weather, which is very severe in the country round about Agra, the force of the Princes proceeded North East until it reached the Chambal. There it met a part of the Imperial force under Khalilullah Khan. By the aid of a Bundela Prince it managed to pass the river unmolested. Khalilullah Khan fell back on Dara's force which was encamped close to Agra. Mahammad Shikoh and Raja Jai Singh had not yet returned from the war with

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 218.

Shujah and Dara's wisest advisers counselled him to wait until their arrival.

Dara Shikoh, however, would not listen. He had by far the larger force and beyond all things he feared that Shah Jahan himself would recover sufficiently to take the field in which case it was very possible that there might be an accommodation between the brothers. On the other hand, a successful battle would make him master of the Empire and free him for ever from all fear of either of his brothers as rivals. To Shah Jahan he went and declared his intention whereupon the old man is said to have given him his blessing: "Well, Dara, since thou art resolved to follow thine own will, go, God bless thee, but remember well these few words: If thou lose the battle, take heed of ever coming into my presence." This battle which was to decide the fate of India took place on the 12th of May 1658 within a very few miles of Agra. One notable point in it and in the subsequent campaigns of the Moghuls is the number of so-called Europeans to be found in the Artillery of the Moghul forces. Most of these were probably either of mixed races, or in the case of Portuguese very often pure natives, who had simply taken the name of some Portuguese patron or master, but inasmuch as we find besides Portuguese mention of various English, French, Dutch and German Gunners, there must have been even at that early time employed in the Native Armies a fair number either of Europeans or semi-Europeans, probably chiefly deserters from the Factories on the Coast. We are too apt to think that the only Europeans at the time in the land were the writers, or professional men concerning whom we get detailed notices. But there was probably many an obscure soldier who left his bones somewhere in Hindustan or the Deccan concerning whom we know nothing.

Dara's Artillery contained quite a number of these Feringees. His army was arranged for the battle thus: the cannons were placed in front chained together; behind them a number of light camels on each of which was fastened a double musket; then came the rest of the army. This as far as it consisted of Moghuls was almost entirely mounted, their weapons being chiefly bows, arrows and swords; besides Dara had a chosen body of Rajputs whose favourite weapon was the sword. The other side was arranged very much in the same way, though Bernier mentions that in the midst of Aurangzeb's mounted men some small field pieces were hidden. The discharge of cannon on both sides commenced the battle. Rustam Khan, an old and experienced Deccan soldier, attacked Aurangzeb's guns. After a fierce onslaught he was driven back. Then came the main fight. The Rajputs under Raja Ram Singh charged right up to where Murad Bux was encouraging his troops on the back of an elephant. When quite close to this Prince an arrow, said to have been shot by Murad himself, stretched Raja Ram Singh dead. Most of the Rajputs who were with the Raja also fell. As regards the attack on Aurangzeb, which was led by Dara himself, at first all was success on the side of the eldest brother. Little by little Aurangzeb's soldiers were pressed back. Dara was ever amongst the foremost, striving to get within an arm's length of the brother whom he well knew to be his greatest rival. The Rajputs here specially distinguished themselves by their reckless courage. The Muhammedan Historian writes thus:

“The fierce Rajputs, by their energy and desperate fighting, made their way to the centre (which was under the command of Aurangzeb himself). One of them, Raja Rup Singh Rathor, sprang from his horse, and, with the greatest daring, having washed his hands of life, cut his way through the ranks of his enemies sword in hand, cast himself under the elephant on which the Prince was riding, and began to cut the girths which secured the howda. The Prince became aware of this daring attempt, and in admiration of the man's bravery, desired his followers to take the rash and fearless fellow alive, but he was cut to pieces.”* Still victory seemed to favour Dara in spite of Murad's escape. His troops had been forced back and everything seemed going well. Aurangzeb to encourage his men had his elephants chained so that it might be understood that he was determined to conquer Dara or die, but still the battle pressed nearer and nearer him. All of a sudden the whole state of affairs changed in a way which would only be possible in an Eastern Army. Kbalilullah Khan, who had been strongly suspected of treachery as regards the passage of Chambal, and who certainly seems to have played the traitor on this occasion, since he did not allow the Moghul troops under his command to take any part in the combat, rode up to Dara and addressed him according to Bernier thus: "Mobhareck-bad, Hazaret, Salamet El-hamd-ul-Allah, God save your Majesty, you have obtained the Victory; what will you do any longer upon your elephant? Is it not enough, that you have exposed yourself so long? If the least of those shots, that have been made into your dais, had reached your person, what would have become of us? Are there traitors wanting in this Army? In the name of God come down quickly, and take horse. What remains more to be done than to pursue those run-aways? Let us do so, nor let us suffer that they should escape our hands."*

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 123.

Dara foolishly listened to his advice, got off his elephant and got on his horse; then when he was no more to be seen as a conspicuous signal to his force, a cry arose that he had been killed. Panic seized the army. There seemed to be nothing more to fight for, and within a very short space of time the victorious army turned into a mob of fugitives. Aurangzeb had won the day and Hindustan. We might note here, that already the military decrepitude of the Moghul armies has become very apparent. The troops which marched with Baber or with Bairam Khan in the first and second battles of Panipat would have hardly lost cohesion or turned to flight even if their commanders had been killed, but with the exception of the Rajputs, the rest of Dara's army, in this, like to other Moghul armies at the time, was neither more or less than an undisciplined mob; keen enough when they were getting the advantage, but without resource at the slightest repulse. No wonder the Empire was on the highway to decay, and that when the French and English in the following century began to employ and drill native troops they found the ordinary armies of a Moghul ruler absolutely incapable of opposing them.

---

* Bernier, p. 123.

Dara fled to Agra, and from thence after a few hours stay set off to Delhi. Shah Jahan was left behind in the Agra fort. The aged Monarch invited Aurangzeb to see him within the imperial Harem, but the son was far too wary thus to give himself into the hands of his aged father. Of his two sisters the elder Begam Sahiba had been a great supporter of Dara Shikoh, but the younger Roshenara Begam was equally devoted to Aurangzeb. This Princess sent the Prince word that if he once entered the Harem he would be seized and probably murdered by the female guards. A great Moghul's Harem is a complete town in itself, and besides the royal concubines and their servants there was a regular body of armed Tartar women whose duty it was to defend the royal quarters. Aurangzeb accordingly temporised. First of all he took possession of the town and then when he found himself secure there, sent his son Mahammad Sultan to wait upon the old Emperor. The young Prince was directed to take troops with him and to seize the strong places in the fort. This he did, and Shah Jahan became from that day for the rest of his life a prisoner therein. Some of his women and much of his treasure remained with him until death. As regards his jewels which he as an old miser kept about himself, he threatened to have them all broken up if there should be any attempt to seize them and this threat seems to have been effectual; but his reign was at an end. Bernier says that he tried to win over Mahammad Sultan by promising to place him on the throne instead of any of his sons, but if he did so try he did not succeed.

By this victory Sulaiman Shikoh was cut off from his father, he being below Agra and Dara above that town fleeing towards the North-West.

Aurangzeb now sent word to Raja Jai Singh who had attended the young Prince on his campaign against Shujah to seize him. This Raja Jai Singh would not do, but he let Sulaiman Shikoh clearly understand that he must not further expect his support. Consequently with much difficulty the unfortunate Prince found his way to Srinagar, the capital of modern Garwal, and there was given a refuge by the Raja; Garwal was not a Muhammedan country nor under the Moghul Empire, so for some time Sulaiman was allowed to reside there in peace. In the meantime at Agra, Aurangzeb still gave out that he intended to retire and seat his brother Murad on the throne. The two together started in pursuit of Dara towards Delhi. Much advice was given to Murad largely by his chief eunuch Shah Abbas that Aurangzeb intended treachery, but the foolish young Prince would not listen. At Muttra a great feast was given by Aurangzeb in his own tent to which Murad was invited. "As soon as he was come, Aurangzeb who expected him, and had already prepared all things with Mir Khan and three or four of his most intimate Captains, was not wanting in embracements, and in redoubling his courtship, civilities and submissions, in so much as gently to pass his handkerchief over his face, and to wipe off his sweat and dust, treating him still with the title of King and Majesty. In the meantime the table is served, they sup, the conversation grows warm, they discourse of various things as they used to do; and at last there is brought a huge bottle of excellent Chiras wine, and some other bottles of Gaboul wine for a debauch. Then Aurangzeb, as a grave serious man, and one that would appear a great Mahumetan, and very regular, nimbly riseth from table, and having with much kindness invited Murad Bakche to be merry with Mir Khan, and the other officers that were there, withdrew as if he would a little repose himself. Murad, who loved a glass of wine very well, and who relished the wine that was served, scrupled not to drink of it to excess. In a word, he made himself drunk, and fell asleep. This was the thing that was wished; for presently some servants of his that were there, were commanded away, under a pretence to let him sleep without making any noise; and then his sabre and poniard were taken from about him. But Aurangzeb was not long, but came himself and awakened him. He entered into the chamber, and roughly hit him with his foot, and when he began to open a little his eyes, he made to him this short and surprising reprimand. What means this, saith he? What sbame and what ignominy is this, that such a King, as you are, should have so little temper, as thus to make himself drunk? What will be said both of you and me? Take this infamous man, this drunkard; tie him hand and foot and throw him into that room to sleep out his wine. No sooner said, but it was executed, notwithstanding all his appeal and outcry five or six persons call upon him; and fetter his hands and feet.'*'

Aurangzeb's emissaries were busy during the night winning over Murad's officers and men, and so although there was a little disturbance at the time, by next morning the whole of the two armies with one voice acclaimed Aurangzeb as Padshah. A force of elephants were sent off in different directions with covered howdas to baffle pursuit in case any of Murad's adherents should attempt to rescue him. He himself was taken first of all to Selimgarh at Delhi and afterwards to the State prison at Gwalior. There he was kept for a considerable time, but he was too dangerous even in a prison to be left alone. Accordingly a charge was brought by the children of a Sayad of Gujarat against him of having when in Gujarat murdered their father. The charge was probably true, but I need hardly say it could only have been brought at Aurangzeb's suggestion. According to Bernier the Muhammedan Law of retaliation was followed. The children of the Sayad were granted the head of Murad and the necessary orders were sent to Gwalior for him to be executed by them. According to another story there was a regular trial in which he was found guilty and was in consequence bitten to death by a cobra, a favourite method of Moghul execution.

Aurangzeb with an army proceeded to Delhi. He did not enter into that town but camped in the Shulimar garden outside the walls. There, on the 16th of July 1658, he took his seat on the throne as Padshah, without troubling himself as to the elaborate ceremonies which ordinarily attended the accession of a new ruler on the Delhi throne. The Khutba was still said in his father's name and the coinage still bore the inscription of his father. It was only after his second coronation at Agra later on, that the Khutba began to be said in his own name and that he commenced having his own name stamped on the coins. Dara made no stay at Delhi and before Aurangzeb had got there, was at Lahore. But even there, he found no resting place. An advance force of Aurangzeb's army pushed on during the rains and compelled him with his remaining forces which were in a great state of disorganisation to hastily evacuate that place. He took the road to Multan, the same that Humayun had taken more than 100 years before, and this, according to the opinion at the time, was the cause of his final ruin, for if, instead of proceeding to Multan, he had proceeded to Cabul where Mahabat Khan, a well-wisher of his, was the Governor, he might easily have recruited with the treasures which he still had a fresh force, and as experience has so often shown that the physically weaker men of Hindustan but rarely have made a successful resistance against the hardy Pathans and Turks of Central Asia, the odds were that with such a force he would have been even then more than a match for Aurangzeb. Not only was Mahabat Khan a well-wisher of Dara's but his master to whom he had ever been faithful, Shah Jahan, had written him a long letter pressing him to join his force with those of Dara Shikoh. This he certainly would have done if only the latter had given him a chance. But no, he must away to Multan. The old Moghul feeling of love for the steppes seems to have been extinct in this unfortunate Prince. He dreaded the rigours of an Afghan winter and preferred to stay in the warmer lands of Hindustan. Finding that Aurangzeb was still on his track, Dara found himself compelled to desert Multan also, and proceeding down the Indus, made for the fortress of Thatta. Of this place of arms he took possession and appointed as its Governor a eunuch, leaving in that place a great part of his treasure and a number of his artillery men (Bernier says that amongst them were a good number of Feringees—Portuguese, English, French and German), and then crossing the desert, seized Ahmedabad, the Governor of which place found it expedient, although he was the father-in-law of Aurangzeb, the latter having married one of his daughters, to submit to him. In the course of a little over a month, Dara began his march to the North having full assurance that Raja Jeswant Singh would again join him against the rigid Mussulman. In this, however, he was mistaken. Through the mediation of Raja Jai Singh, Jeswant Singh received plenary pardon from Aurangzeb, and consequently, most unlike indeed the chivalrous race to which he belonged, determined to have nothing to do with poor Dara. News of his defection reached Dara on his arrival at Ajmere. Bernier graphically describes this Prince's miserable plight thus:

---

* Bernier, pp. 158—61.

“And now what could this poor Dara do? He seeth himself abandoned, and frustrated of his hopes. He considers, that to turn back safe to Amedevad (Ahmedabad) was impossible, in regard that it was a march of thirty and five daies; that it was in the heart of summer; that water would fail him; that they were all the Lands of Rajas, Friends or Allies of Iesseigne or Iessom-seigne; that the army of Aurangzeb which was not harassed like his, would not fail to follow him. 'Tis as good, saith he, to perish here, and although the match be altogether unequal, let us venture all, and give battle once more.”*

According to Bernier, it was hardly a battle at all. But the Muhammedan Historian Khafi Khan tells us quite a different story, for three days Aurangzeb tried and tried in vain to carry Dara's works, and on the fourth day only it was by reason of a vigorous attack, pushed home by some Rajput troops that Dara Shikoh was finally routed. Bernier also suggests that Dara's chief adviser, Shah Nawaz Khan, was a traitor and disclosed all his plans to Aurangzeb. Khafi Khan, on the other hand, states that he was the soul of the advance. Which story is true, it is difficult to say, though as Aurangzeb had married Shah Nawaz's daughter it is very possible that the statement made by Bernier is correct. On the other hand, Shah Nawaz Khan died in the battle, which would seem to support Khafi Khan. Dara Shikoh, with only a very few attendants and a few of his women, fled in the direction of Ahmedabad. This battle at Ajmere took place in the cold weather of 1658-1659. Evidently Dara Shikoh had stayed near Ajmere a considerable time. When Dara got close to Ahmedabad he found the gates of that fortress shut against him. Close to this town he met Bernier and made him for a short time in the absence of any Native Hakim his Physician, but as he set off North again on his travels and had no means of transport for the French Physician, the latter to his great delight was left behind. Bernier himself went to Ahmedabad and from thence subsequently to Delhi. Dara struck for Thatta only to learn that the garrison was at its last extremity. Instead of throwing himself into it, or making an attempt to strike for Persia, in which he would probably have succeeded, he determined largely at the solicitation of his wife, not to give up the struggle for the crown, and consequently proceeding North, entered the country of Malik Jiwan, the Zamindar of Dhandar. Here his wife died, and as the Muhammedan Historian says mountain after mountain of trouble thus pressed upon the heart of Dara, grief was added to grief, sorrow to sorrow, so that his mind no longer retained its equilibrium. Without considering the consequences, he sent her corpse to Lahore in charge of Gul Muhammad, to be buried there. He thus parted from one who had been faithful to him through his darkest troubles. He himself remained, attended only by a few domestic servants and useless eunuchs.

---

* Bernier, pp. 203-204.

At last he determined on flight to Persia, but alas! it was too late. He was seized along with his grandson Sipah Shikoh. As soon as they had started on their flight both grandfather and grandson were seized by the traitor Malik Jiwan, chained and mounted upon an elephant and thus taken first of all to the Army at Thatta which town shortly after surrendered, and then brought to Delhi. Aurangzeb and his Counsellors thought it necessary that they should be publicly paraded through the principal bazaars of that town in order that there might be no doubt of Dara being really the person captured. Consequently both grandfather and grandson were marched through the Chandni Chowk. Bernier who was at Delhi at the time was surprised at this measure, inasmuch as he considered the guard round Dara insufficient to keep him a prisoner provided there was any attempt at rescue.

There was, however, none, although on every side was to be heard great lamentations for Dara who had been a very popular Prince. Malik Jiwan, who had received the title of Bahadur Khan, entered the town two days afterwards. He met a very unpleasant reception.

“The idlers, the partisans of Dara Shikoh, the workmen and people of all sorts, inciting each other, gathered into a mob, and, assailing Jiwan and his companions with abuse and imprecations, they pelted them with dirt and filth, and clods and stones, so that several persons were knocked down and killed, and many were wounded. Jiwan was protected by shields held over his head, and he at length made his way through the crowd to the palace. They say that the disturbance on this day was so great that it bordered on rebellion. If the Kotwal had not come forward with his policemen, not one of Malik Jiwan's followers would have escaped with life. Ashes and pots full of urine and ordure were thrown down from the roofs of the houses upon the heads of the Afghans, and many of the bystanders were injured.”*

Dara Shikoh only survived this degradation a very few days. Condemned to death in accordance with a decision of the Chief Lawyers as an Apostate from Islam, he was forthwith executed. The head was carried to Aurangzeb, who presently commanded it to be put in a dish, and that water should be fetched; which when brought, he wiped off with an handkerchief, and after he had caused the face to be washed clean, and the blood done away, and was fully satisfied that it was the very head of Dara, he fell a-weeping, and said these words: “Ah! Bed bakt! Ah! unfortunate man! Take it away, and bury it in the sepulchre of Humayun.”†

This was in September 1659. Sixteen months had only elapsed since he had dismounted from his elephant on that fateful day before Agra which had deprived him for ever of the crown of Hindustan. Dara Shikoh's son Sultan Shikoh did not long stay at Srinagar. Eventually the Raja of that place gave him up, and he was sent to Aurangzeb who sent him to the State fortress at Gwalior. State prisoners I may say at that fort did not long survive. When for any reason it was not desirable to put such a prisoner to an immediate death and his death was all the same desired, it was customary to force the unfortunate captive to drink a large cup of Poust, a concoction from opium, every morning before he was allowed to take any food. The consequence was speedy idiocy and a lingering death.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp 245-246.

† Bernier, p. 234.

I have told the story of Dara Shikoh without break, though if the events of this civil war were to be treated chronologically, I should have had to break in more than once by recounting the fortunes of Prince Shujah. This person after his defeat by Sulaiman Shikoh had retreated to Bengal, but on the defeat of Dara and on the melting away of the force which had been commanded by Sulaiman Shikoh, again advanced up the Ganges and took both Allahabad and Benares. It was this which forced Aurangzeb to return from Multan up to which place he had pursued Dara Shikoh. The decisive battle took place at the village of Kora. Jeswant Singh, who was with Aurangzeb's forces here, acted as treacherously to him as he did a little later on to Dara when the latter marched to Ajmere. A large body of Rajputs under his command, the night before the battle, set about plundering the royal camp and having done this, as he thought satisfactorily, marched towards Agra without taking any care of the battle which was about to take place. On reaching Agra Jeswant Singh set rumours afloat that Aurangzeb had been defeated, and in consequence trouble threatened to break out on this account. The news, however, of what had really happened reached Agra very shortly after these troublesome Rajputs, and consequently all fears of disturbances in the capital disappeared. In the battle the Sayads of Barah took a leading part, as indeed they did in all the battles of that time. For a long time victory seemed doubtful. According to Bernier, Sultan Shikoh owed his final defeat to having dismounted from his elephant just as Dara had done before Agra; but whether this be so or not (Khafi Khan does not mention it) after a fiercely contested field Sultan Shikoh's troops were routed. This was at the beginning of 1659. The defeated Prince was forced to retreat to Bengal. Aurangzeb did not himself pursue him, but returned to Agra. The rest of the story as regards this Prince may shortly be told. Mir Jumla whom we have seen locked up at the beginning of the Civil War by Aurangzeb, was released as soon as his family was out of danger by reason of Dara's flight from Agra and was sent along with Prince Muhammad Sultan, Aurangzeb's eldest son, to drive Prince Shujah out of Bengal. They experienced much the same difficulty that Humayun had more than a hundred years before in his campaign against Sher Shah owing to the flooding of this Province during the rains. Muhammad Sultan who seems to have been ever an object of suspicion to his father was seduced by Shujah's emissaries and deserted the Imperial Standard, allying himself to his uncle by a marriage with the latter's daughter. He did not, however, get on well with his new father-in-law and after a short time returned to his allegiance. This did not, however, protect him from Aurangzeb's wrath. Sent to Court, he was like any other dangerous political prisoner sent to the State fortress at Gwalior where he subsequently died. Shujah himself was finally routed and driven out of the country by Mir Jumla. Escaping to Arakan he at first managed to win the graces of the King of that country. But subsequently quarrels broke out; the King wanted to marry one of Shujah's daughters, an unpardonable insult to a Mussulman of Shujah's position. On the other hand, this Prince's followers entered into a conspiracy to kill the King and seize the country. The consequence was a slaughter of most of Shujah's followers and his own escape into the trackless forest between Arakan and Pegu where it seems he perished. Anyhow nothing was further heard of him. Shujah was finally driven from Bengal at the end of 1659 A. D., and disappeared altogether in 1660. At last Aurangzeb was free from the rivalry of his brothers, but his old father still survived and until his death the Emperor always seemed to have been fearful that Shah Jahan would be released from his prison and be set again on the throne by those that for any reason did not wish him (Aurangzeb) to reign over them. Thence for the first few years a strict guard over the aged ex-Emperor was a cardinal point in Aurangzeb's politics.

Aurangzeb's second coronation took place early in May 1659, and it was from this date that he began those innovations in administration which eventually contributed so largely to the overthrow of the Moghul power in India. His first step was innocent enough, but still was a forecast of what was about to follow. The solar year which since the time of Akbar had been the official year of account was abolished, inasmuch as it was the year of the fire worshippers and not a Muhammedan era. In its place the old Hejira year was introduced both for Revenue and other purposes and all the festivals of the solar year were abolished. Khafi Khan, a good Muhammedan himself, remarks :

“ Mathematicians, astronomers, and men who have studied history, know that the recurrence of the four seasons, summer, winter, the rainy season of Hindustan, the autumn and spring harvests, the ripening of the corn, and fruit of each season, the tankahwah of the jagirs, and the money of the mansabdars, are all dependent upon the solar reckoning, and cannot be regulated by the lunar ; still his religious Majesty was unwilling that the nouroz and the year and months of the Magi should give their names to the anniversary of his accession.”*

This was only the first of the many steps by which Aurangzeb attempted to turn the Empire of Hindustan into a Muhammedan State in which Hindus and other non-believers were only to exist on sufferance, and were not to be treated as having any rights against the followers of Islam. Unfortunately these Hindus and other non-believers were the majority of his subjects and naturally resented any such methods of administration. The consequence was that his reign of nearly fifty years was a reign of disintegration, and that at his death the Moghul Empire of Hindustan was tottering to its fall.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 241-242.

AURANGZEB.

AURANGZEB'S reign takes up the greater part of the second half of the seventeenth century. When it began, the Moghul Empire was, in spite of the vices of the Court and the laxity in some high places and oppression in others, in its most palmy state. When he died in 1707 A. D., although the Moghul Empire had largely increased towards the South by the accession to it of the greater part of the Indian peninsula, decay had already set in. The arches had cracked, the beams were strained, and the building showed everywhere signs of imminent fall. What was the cause of this change? Aurangzeb was a great man, much greater in intellect and also in moral force than either his father or grandfather. In his personal life he was abstemious, save as regards women, to an extreme degree, and even as regards the pleasures of the Harem he was extremely moderate. He was a hard worker, even the second Philip of Spain was not a more laborious toiler. To this ruler, indeed, he bore a considerable likeness; but in his intellect he was far keener, in his statesmanship saner and in his religious bigotry more intelligent than the monarch who threw back Spain for ever from the great nations of the earth. He had indeed a very different situation to deal with from that which confronted the Spanish Monarch. Philip had to deal with two great sets of opponents, those which struggled against his desire for Politic Absolutism and the Protestant Reformers. The latter at the start were but a small body, and as to the former, though many in number, most would have been content with a small amount of concession. It was his steady refusal to yield in the slightest to either, that caused the revolts in the Low Countries and the endless wars there, which ruined Spain. Aurangzeb had, on the other hand, no members of a new creed, few in numbers and strong only in zeal, with which to contend. But, on the other hand, he had to deal with a large majority of his subjects, the followers of an old religion, one which exerts the greatest power over its followers, and which enters into every act of their daily life. A direct attack was accordingly impossible. It was only by gradual sap and mine that progress could be made. Throwing down the temples in cities, such as Benares and Muttra and building mosques in their place, the granting of high honours to converts, the gradual substitution of Muhammedans for Hindus, wherever practicable, in high commands, the putting down of customs dear to Hinduism as repugnant to Muhammedanism, all these were measures by which this Muhammedan missionary desired to convert the people of Hindustan into a Muhammedan community. Add that he also looked on Rajputs with a jealous eye as having more political independence than he desired, and we can easily understand why the Hindus did not love Aurangzeb. But with all this, it is doubtful whether he would not have been far more successful than he was, and whether he would not have handed down the Imperial edifice practically unimpaired, had not there arisen at the time a Hindu of as iron a resolution and of as intrepid a genius as his own. It would be idle to compare Sivaji in many ways with William the Silent, but from one point of view they have a strong resemblance. Whether Sivaji ever was a great lover of his race may be doubted, but his deep affection for his ancestral religion stands without the shadow of a doubt. First of all, as in the case of William the Silent, he was willing to remain a vassal of his Suzerain, but when he found out that Suzerain's plans both as regards himself and his religion, he not only determined on, but organised resistance; and did this latter so effectually that in spite of all Moghul endeavour, the Mahrattas became an ever increasingly powerful community, which nothing could crush and which ultimately very nearly succeeded the Moghul in the Lordship of India.

We have few estimates of Aurangzeb's character from Muhammedan writers of the time. One from Khafi Khan written after his death is short; another written during his reign is necessarily of the nature of a panegyric and is very long, but both are too illuminating to be omitted. The first runs thus:—"Of all the sovereigns of the house of Timur—nay, of all the sovereigns of Delhi—no one since Sikander Lodi has ever been apparently so distinguished for devotion, austerity and justice. In courage, long-sufferings, and sound judgment, he was unrivalled. But from reverence for the injunctions of the Law he did not make use of punishment, and without punishment the administration of a country cannot be maintained. Dissensions had arisen among his nobles, through rivalry. So every plan and project that he formed came to little good; and every enterprise which he undertook was long in execution, and failed of its objects. Although he lived for ninety years, his five senses were not at all impaired, except his hearing, and that to only so slight an extent that it was not perceptible to others. He often passed his nights in vigils and devotions, and he denied himself many pleasures naturally belonging to humanity."*

My readers will note with surprise that Aurangzeb was slow to punish, but the history of his whole reign shows that, save in cases where he feared for his throne, particularly from his relations, he was exceedingly lenient. Pyramids of skulls had no fascination for him. We read nowhere in his reign of massacres, nor of cruelty such as is to be found in the annals of the earlier Moghuls. On the other hand, it would have been better for him and for India, indeed, if at times he had shown a little more hardness, especially to his own officers, who constantly neglected or disobeyed his orders. The other estimate of Aurangzeb's character is much more elaborate. "Be it known to the readers of this work that this humble slave of the Almighty is going to describe in a correct manner the excellent character, the worthy habits and the refined morals of this most virtuous monarch, Abu-l Muzaffar Muhi-ud-din Muharamad Aurangzeb, Alamgir, according as he has witnessed them with his own eyes.

The Emperor, a great worshipper of God, by natural propensity, is remarkable for his rigid attachment to religion. He is a follower of the doctrines of the Imam Abu Harifa (may God be pleased with him), and establishes the five fundamental doctrines of the Kanz. Having made his ablutions, he always occupies a great part of his time in adoration of the deity and says the usual prayers, first in the Musjid and then at home, both in congregation and in private, with the most heart-felt devotion. He keeps the appointed fasts on Fridays and other sacred days, and he reads the Friday prayers in the Juma Musjid with the common people of the Muhammedan faith. He keeps vigils during the whole of the sacred nights, and with the light of the favour of God illumines the lamps of religion and prosperity. From his great piety, he passes whole nights in the mosque which is in his palace, and keeps company with men of devotion. In privacy he never sits on a throne. He gave away in alms before his accession a portion of his allowance of lawful food and clothing, and now devotes to the same purpose the income of a few villages in the district of Delhi, and the proceeds of two or three salt-producing tracts, which are appropriated to his privy purse. The princes also follow the same example. During the whole month of Ramazan he keeps fast, says the prayers appointed for that month, and reads the Holy Koran in the assembly of religious and learned men, with whom he sits for that purpose during six, and sometimes nine hours of the night. During the last ten days of the month, he performs worship in the mosque, and although on account of several obstacles, he is unable to proceed on a pilgrimage to Mecca, yet the care which he takes to promote facilities for pilgrims to that holy place may be considered equivalent to the pilgrimage. From the dawn of his understanding he has always refrained from prohibited meats and practices, and from his great holiness has adopted nothing but that which is pure and lawful. Though he has collected at the foot of his throne those who inspire ravishment in joyous assemblies of pleasure, in the shape of singers who possess lovely voices and clever instrumental performers, and in the commencement of his reign sometimes used to hear them sing and play, and though he himself understands music well, yet now for several years past, on account of his great restraint and self-denial, and observant of the tenets of the great Imam (Shafi) (may God's mercy be on him), he entirely abstains from this amusement. If any of the singers and musicians becomes ashamed of his calling, he makes an allowance for him or grants him land for his maintenance. He never puts on the clothes prohibited by religion, nor does he ever use vessels of silver or gold.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 586.

In his sacred Court no improper conversation, no word of backbiting or falsehood, is allowed. His courtiers, on whom his light is reflected, are cautioned that if they have to say anything that might injure the character of an absent man, they should express themselves in decorous language and at full detail. He appears two or three times every day in his court of audience with a pleasing countenance and mild look, to dispense justice to complainants who come in numbers without any hindrance, and as he listens to them with great attention, they make their representations without any fear or hesitation, and obtain redress from his impartiality. If any person talks too much, or acts in an improper manner, he is never displeased, and he never knits his brows. His courtiers have often desired to prohibit people from showing so much boldness, but he remarks that by hearing their very words, and seeing their gestures, he acquires a habit of forbearance and tolerance. All bad characters are expelled from the city of Delhi, and the same is ordered to be done in all places throughout the whole Empire. The duties of preserving order and regularity among the people are very efficiently attended to, and throughout the Empire, notwithstanding its great extent, nothing can be done without meeting with the due punishment enjoined by the Muhammedan Law. Under the dictates of anger and passion he never issues orders of death. In consideration of their rank and merit, he shows much honour and respect to the Sayads, saints and learned men, and through his cordial and liberal exertions, the sublime doctrines of Hanifa and of our pure religion have obtained such prevalence throughout the wide territories of Hindustan as they never had in the reign of any former king.

Hindu writers have been entirely excluded from holding public offices, and all the worshipping places of the infidels and the great temples of these infamous people have been thrown down and destroyed in a manner which excites astonishment at the successful completion of so difficult a task. His Majesty personally teaches the sacred kalima to many infidels with success, and invests them with khillats and other favours. Alms and donations are given by this fountain of generosity in such abundance, that the Emperors of past ages did not give even a hundredth part of the amount. In the sacred month of Ramazan sixty thousand rupees, and in other months less than that amount, are distributed among the poor. Several eating houses have been established in the Capital and other cities, at which food is served out to the helpless and poor, and in places where there were no caravanserais for the lodging of the travellers, they have been built by the Emperor. All the mosques in the Empire are repaired at the public expense. Imams, criers to the daily prayers, and readers of the khutba, have been appointed to each of them, so that a large sum of money has been and is still laid out in these disbursements. In all the cities and towns of this extensive country pensions and allowances and lands have been given to learned men and professors, and stipends have been fixed for scholars according to their abilities and qualifications. As it is a great object with this Emperor that all Muhammedans should follow the principles of the religion as expounded by the most competent law officers and the followers of the Hanifi persuasion, and as these principles, in consequence of the different opinions of the Kazis and Muftis which have been delivered without any authority, could not be distinctly and clearly learnt, and as there was no book which embodied them all, and as until many books had been collected and a man had obtained sufficient leisure, means and knowledge of theological subjects, he could not satisfy his enquiries on any disputed point, therefore His Majesty, the protector of the faith, determined that a body of eminently learned and able men of Hindustan should take up the voluminous and most trustworthy works which were collected in the royal library, and having made a digest of them, compose a book which might form a standard canon of the law, and afford to all an easy and available means of ascertaining the proper and authoritative interpretation. The chief conductor of this difficult undertaking was the most learned man of the time, Shaikh Nizam, and all members of the society were very handsomely and liberally paid, so that up to the present time a sum of about two hundred thousand rupees has been expended in this valuable compilation, which contains more than one hundred thousand lines. When the work with God's pleasure is completed, it will be for all the world the standard exposition of the law, and render every one independent of Muhammedan doctors.'*'

After due deductions for the long hyperboles of Eastern flattery the picture drawn is on the whole true. Aurangzeb was in many ways a typical Muhammedan religious king. With him religion was always the first thought. His method of gaining the throne was indeed crooked to the extreme and pleas of religion were in this case, indeed, but an excuse for worldly gain. His objections to his brothers as irreligious, however sincere, were not the motive forces in his conduct, and the ruling motive in the wars conquering the throne, was without a doubt self-aggrandizement. Even when Emperor, no blood relationship was sacred if he had the slightest suspicion of such blood relation aiming at the throne. After he had obtained the throne too and ruled in peace and safety, as far as an Eastern Sovereign ever can or could, he still preferred the crooked rather than the straight course; was full of trickery and deceit and did not hesitate where he thought it desirable to poison or get rid of any person whom he thought were plotting against him. But granted all this, save as regards his retention of the Imperial power, there is no doubt that the glory and spread of the Muhammedan religion was ever foremost in his thoughts. Like many another ruler too, probably he was thoroughly persuaded that the cause of his religion and his own interests were identical, and that no other person save himself could be so helpful on the throne of Delhi to the spread of Islam. It will be noted in the extract which I have quoted from Bakhtawar Khan that though he loved music he kept from it on account of his following in this respect the teaching of the great Muhammedan Doctor, Shafi. He carried his religious objections to it so far that at last he passed a prohibition against singing and dancing alike. "One day a number of singers and minstrels gathered together with great cries, and having fitted up a bier with a good deal of display, round which were grouped the public wailers,† they passed under the Emperor's jharokha-i-darsan, or interview window. When he inquired what was intended by the bier and the show, the minstrels said that music was dead, and they were carrying his corpse for burial. Aurangzeb then directed them to place it deep in the ground, that no sound or cry might afterwards arise from it."*

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 156.

† Note.—Public wailers are prohibited in the Koran, but practically the habit which prevailed before the days of Muhammad, has never ceased in Muhammedan countries.

One great service Aurangzeb did to Muhammedanism, the benefits of which has come down to this day and this was the direction to codify the Muhammedan Law as expounded by the school of Hanifa. The work then compiled is known as the Fatwa Alam-giri. This is what English lawyers would call a digest, a vast number of concrete cases with the opinions (Fatwa) of Muhammedan lawyers on them and the reasons for the same.

A story is told by Bernier and also by Manucci—a Venetian physician many years at Shah Jahan's and Aurangzeb's Court of an old tutor of Aurangzeb's having presented himself to his former pupil in hopes of obtaining preferment by reason of Aurangzeb's having ascended the Imperial throne. Bernier tells us that for three months the Emperor took no notice of him and that when he did, he addressed him in a long speech which he gives at length. I reproduce it, though it be long, as if it does not represent Aurangzeb's own thoughts, it represents what the author of the speech thought that he should have thought.

“What is it you would have of me, doctor? Can you reasonably desire I should make you one of the chief omrahs of my Court? Let me tell you if you had instructed me as you should have done, nothing would be more just: For I am of this persuasion, that a child well educated and instructed, is as much at least obliged to his master as his father? But where are those good documents you have given me. In the first place, you have taught me that all Frangistan (so it seems they call Europe) was nothing, but I know not what little Island, of which the greatest king was he of Portugal, and next to him he of Holland, and after him he of England; and as to the other kings as those of France and Andalusia, you have represented them to me as our petty Rajas; telling me that the kings of Hindostan were far above them all together, and that they were the true and only Houmayons, the Ekbars, the

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 283.

Jehan-Guyres, the Chah-Jehans, the fortunate ones, the great ones, the conquerors and kings of the World; and that Persia, and Usbec, Kach-guer, Tatar and Catay, Pegu, China and Mat-china did tremble at the names of the kings of Indostan: admirable geography. You should rather have taught me exactly to distinguish all those different states of the world, and well to understand their strength, their way of fighting, their customs, religions, governments and interests; and by the perusal of solid history to observe their progress, rise, decay, and whence, how and by what accidents and errors those great changes and revolutions of Empires and Kingdoms have happened. I have scarce learned of you the name of my Grand Sires, the famous founders of this empire; so far were you from having taught me the history of their life, and what course they took to make such great conquests. You had a mind to teach me the Arabian tongue, to read and to write; I am much obliged to you forsooth for having made me lose so much time upon a language that requires ten or twelve years to attain to its perfection; as if the son of a king should think it to be an honour to him, to be a grammarian, or some doctor of the law, and to learn other languages than those of his neighbours, when he cannot well be without them; he, to whom time is so precious for so many weighty things, which he ought by times to learn. As if there were any spirit that did not with some reluctancy, and even with a kind of debasement, employ itself in so sad and dry an exercise, so longsome and tedious, as is that of learning words."* "Know you not, that childhood well governed, being a state which is ordinarily accompanied with a happy memory, is capable of thousands of good precepts and instructions, which remain deeply impressed the whole remainder of a man's life, and keep the mind always raised for great actions? The law, prayers, and sciences may they not as well be learned in our mother-tongue as in Arabick? You told my father Chah-Jehan, that you would teach me philosophy. 'Tis true, I remember very well, that you have entertained me for many years with airy questions, of things that afford no satisfaction at all to the mind, and are of no use in humane society, empty notions, and meer phancies, that have only this in them, that they are very hard to understand, and very easie to forget, which are only capable to tire and spoil a good understanding, and to breed an opinion that is unsupportable. I still remember, that after you had thus amused me, I know not how long, with your fine philosophy, all I retained of it, was a multitude of barbarous and dark words, proper to bewilder, perplex and tire out the best wits, and only invented, the better to convey the vanity and ignorance of men like yourself, that would make us believe that they know all, and that under those obscure and ambiguous words are hid great mysteries, which they alone are capable to understand: If you had seasoned me with that philosophy, which formeth the mind to ratiocination, and insensibly accustoms it to be satisfied with nothing but solid reasons; if you had given me those excellent precepts and doctrines which raise the soul above the assaults of fortune, and reduce her to an unshakeable and always equal temper, and permit her not to be lifted up by prosperity, nor debased by adversity; if you had taken care to give me the knowledge of what we are, and what are the first principles of the things: and had assisted me in forming in my mind a fit idea of the greatness of the universe, and of the admirable order and motion of the parts thereof; if, I say, you had instilled into me this kind of philosophy, I should think myself incomparably more obliged to you than Alexander was to his Aristotle; and believe it my duty to recompense you otherwise, than he did him. Should not you instead of flattery, have taught me somewhat of that point, so important to a king, which is, what the reciprocal duties are of a sovereign to his subjects, and those of subjects to their sovereign? And ought not you to have considered, that one day I should be obliged with the sword to dispute my life and the crown with my brothers? Is not that the destiny almost of all the sons of Indostan? Have you ever taken any care to make me learn, what it is to besiege a town, or to set an army in array? For these things I am obliged to others, not at all to you. Go, and retire to the village, whence you are come, and let no body know who you are, or what is become of you.'*'

* Bernier, p. 78.

* Bernier, p. 82.

The whole speech shows undoubted signs of having been edited if not entirely invented by some European. No Muhammedan, no orthodox, devout Muhammedan, such as Aurangzeb could possibly have uttered the tirade against Arabic that is set forth in this speech. The references to European states is not in the least like what any haughty Moghul prince, and least of all one like Aurangzeb would have uttered; nor are the references to a literary tutor instructing his pupil in the arts of war what any sensible person would have said and the Emperor at least had sense. The whole speech savours of a lively French invention; it is what we might expect from a Frenchman living in the same half century as Fenelon and the other moral authors of Louis XIV's Court, but beyond the fact that the tutor did not get what he wanted and was sent away without having been shown any favour, it is not safe to accept any other part of the story. Bernier has indeed only used the same license which other ancient and medieval writers have used, i.e., of putting into their hero's mouth what they think they should have said without knowing in the least what they actually did say.

One great difficulty in writing the history of the reign of Aurangzeb is the fact that in the tenth year of his reign he forbade any history of his time being written. This prohibition was issued suddenly. Previous to it encouragement had been given to Muhammad Kazim, who might be styled the Imperial Historian, to write an official account of the reign; an Alamgirnama. The consequence is that although much nearer our time, we have much less complete information concerning this period as regards the general affairs of the Empire at least—than we have concerning the days of Akbar. There are here no series of writers to compare with each other, such as Budaoni, Nizam Uddin and Abul Fazl. One Muhammedan historian alone, Hasbim Ali Khan, gives us a consecutive and detailed account of the forty-nine years of Aurangzeb's government. This author's history was published during the half century which followed the Emperor's death. He was employed in public duties by the Emperor during the later part of his reign, and there is no reason to doubt his authority in all its main lines. The later Muhammedan historians use the terms of flattery without stint when there is anything to gain by so doing, they have also a great love of fine—absurdly fine, we English think it—writing. This style of composition is indeed almost universally prevalent in Indian historical writers who use the Persian language; a history without a reference to a nightingale or a garden is hardly to be met. But all the same the kernel of veracity, the desire to tell what is true, and the trouble to find it out, are everywhere to be found in our Indian Muhammedan historians. They have the practical historical sense strongly developed, and their accounts are to be preferred to those of any European traveller when one wishes really to study the history of the times. European visitors to India may be taken to truly report what they themselves have seen; but a great part of their writings is taken up with what they have heard and much of this must have been from their own servants, the most unreliable of all native sources. On the other hand, the Muhammedan historian is nearly always a Court official, generally of some standing, so were our great historiographers of Akbar's time; and so was Hashim Ali Khan, who is better known as Khafi Khan. Whether he got the name Khafi, inasmuch as his writings were Khafi (concealed) during Aurangzeb's time, or whether it was because he came from Khaf near Nishapur in Persia, matters but little. In any case he tells us in his great work the Muntakhab-ul-Lubab, the method how he came to put together his work.* “After the expiration of ten years (of the reign), authors were forbidden to write the events of this just and righteous Emperor's reign. Nevertheless some competent persons (did write), and particularly Musta'idd Khan, who secretly wrote an abridged account of the campaign in the Dakhin, simply detailing the conquests of the countries and forts, without alluding at all to the misfortunes of the campaign; and Bindraban, who wrote an abridged account of the events of some years of the second and third decades. But I have never seen nor obtained any history that contains a full and detailed account of the forty remaining years of the reign. Consequently, from the eleventh to the twenty-first year of the Emperor's reign, I have not been able to relate the events in the order in which they occurred, giving the month and year; but after this year with very great labour and pains, I collected information from the papers in the public offices, and by inquiry made from truthful persons, the confidential and old servants of the Emperor and old eunuchs. This, and whatsoever I myself observed, after attaining years of discretion, for thirty or forty years I laid up in the strong box (of my memory), and that I have written. And since I heard that Bindraban Das Bahadur Shahi, who was long a mutasaddi of Shah Alam during the time he was a prince, had compiled a history, and had included in it an account of upwards of thirty years, being exceedingly anxious to see it, I made great search for it. Subsequently when, after great trouble, I obtained a copy, and examined it carefully from beginning to end, in the hope that I might gather the rich fruits of his labours, I discovered that his work did not contain one-half of what I had collected and included in my own history."

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 282.

In another place he tells us how he got his material together. "The attempt to write an epitome of the fifty years' reign of this illustrious monarch is like trying to measure the waters of the sea in a pitcher. The affairs of the last forty years in particular are a boundless ocean, which authors have shrunk from committing to the thread of narrative. But for all this, the writer of these pages has resolved that to the best of his ability, and with the most active exertion, after the most exhaustive enquiry and complete investigation, he will narrate some events capable of narration which he has heard from the tongues of men advanced in years, which he has fully verified by inquiries from men in office and from writers of official despatches, and by evidence of his own eyes during this period of time."*

The result is a history, which if not abounding in detail throughout, such as some of the earlier histories give, is still a very clear account of Aurangzeb's reign. From it we can clearly understand how the disruptive forces, which after Aurangzeb's death broke asunder the Moghul Empire, gathered force in this reign, and how Aurangzeb's policy helped rather than restrained them. Other sources of the history of the time are Rajputs and Mahratta annals and documents and also the records of the European Factories on the coast, particularly of the English Factory at Madras. But all these relate almost entirely to local matters and the history of the Empire as a whole we can only get from Khafi Khan.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 212.

II.

Aurangzeb, known commonly in Oriental history as Alamgir, was born in 1619 A. D. at Dhud in the Deccan, where his father Shah Jehan was at the time Subahdar. He reigned from A. D. 1658 till 1707 A. D. being nearly eighty-eight at the time of his death, an age which but few Kings of the West have ever exceeded. Indeed of rulers of modern times, who have also been makers of history I can only name two, William the First of Germany and Pope Leo the XIII. I have already told the tale of how Aurangzeb gained the Empire, His sister Roshanara was supposed to have great influence over him and certainly helped him in various ways to get the Crown. She was not however an influence at Court for long. Scandalous stories about her amours are repeated by European writers and it is certain that after the first few years of the reign she disappears from history. Her elder sister Begam Sahiba stayed with Shah Jahan to the last. For a long time she would have nothing to do with Aurangzeb, but eventually there seems to have been a reconciliation between them. For long she opposed Dara Shikoh's daughter who was with the grandfather in the Agra Fort being given in marriage to Akbar, Aurangzeb's third son; but after a time this opposition ceased, and it would seem that after Shah Jahan's death she on more occasions than one successfully interceded with Aurangzeb. Other women of the harem whose names are mentioned as having influenced affairs are Fakhrun Nissa, Aurangzeb's eldest daughter, and Udaipuri, a Georgian Christian, first of all a concubine of Dara Shikoh and afterwards of the Emperor himself. Neither of them seem really to have had much influence over Aurangzeb, who throughout his reign, really ruled throughout as King alone.

Aurangzeb celebrated his succession in the ordinary way of princes, especially of princes who have succeeded after civil strife to the throne. He reduced the taxes. "To comfort the people and alleviate their distress, the Emperor gave orders for the remission of the rahdari (toll) which was collected on every highway (guzar), frontier and ferry, and brought in a large sum to the revenue. He also remitted the pandari, a ground or house cess, which was paid throughout the Imperial dominions by every tradesman and dealer, from the butcher, the potter, and the greengrocer, to the draper, jeweller, and banker. Something was paid to the government according to rule under this name for every bit of ground in the market, for every stall and shop, and the total revenue thus derived exceeded lacs (of rupees). Other cesses, lawful and unlawful, as the sar-shumari, buzshumari, bar-gadi, the charai (grazing tax) of the Banjaras, the tuwa'ana, the collections from the fairs held at the festivals of Muhammedan saints, and at the jatras or fairs of the infidels, held near Hindu temples, throughout the country far and wide, where lacs of people assemble once a year, and where buying and selling of all kinds goes on, the tax on spirits, on gambling-houses, on brothels, the fines, thank-offerings, and the fourth part of debts recovered by the help of Magistrates from creditors,—these and other imposts, nearly eighty in number, which brought in krores of rupees to the public treasury, were all abolished throughout Hindustan. Besides these, the tithe of corn, which lawfully brought in twenty-five lacs of rupees, was remitted in order to alleviate the heavy cost of grain. To enforce these remissions, stringent orders were published everywhere throughout the provinces by the hands of mace-bearers and soldiers (ahadis)."* But our author tells us that in spite of these remissions, save as regards the pandari which was collected chiefly in the large cities, the abolition had no effect. Local governors did not hesitate to collect the abolished taxes in spite of all orders to the contrary. "Firstly, because throughout the Imperial dominions in the reign of Aurangzeb, no fear and dread of punishment remained in the hearts of the jaghirdars faujdars, and zamindars; secondly, because the revenue officers; through inattention or want of consideration, or with an eye to profit, contrary to what was intended, made deductions (for these cesses) from the tankhwah accounts of the jaghirdars. So the jaghirdars, under the pretext that the amount of the cesses was entered in their tankhwah papers, continued to collect the rahdari and many others of the abolished imposts, and even increased them. When reports reached the government of infractions of these orders, the offenders were punished with a diminution of mansab, and the delegation of mace-bearers to their districts. After a while, the offenders, through their patrons or the management of their agents, got their mansab restored to its original amount. So the regulation for the abolition for most of the imposts had no effect.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 246.

The rahdari in particular is condemned by righteous and just men as a most vexatious impost, and oppressive to travellers, but a large sum is raised by it. In most parts of the Imperial territories the faujdars and jaghirdars, by force and tyranny, now exact more than ever from the traders and poor and necessitous travellers. The zamindars also, seeing that no enquiries are made, extort more on roads within their boundaries than is collected on roads under royal officers. By degrees matters have come to such a pass, that between the time of leaving the factory or port and reaching their destination, goods and merchandize pay double their cost price in tolls. Through the villainy and oppression of the toll-collectors and the zamindars, the property, the honour, and the lives of thousands of travellers and peaceful wayfarers are frittered away.’* Nowadays under the British Government such acts on the part of a Local authority would not be possible. But let not my readers think, that even with the British Government, orders in such matters and obedience are the same thing. The West is still the West and the East is still the East, and as regards the taking of something beyond the legal demand, in spite of all the British Government can do, the thing is carried on to this day. Taking a present is unknown amongst the upper classes of public servants in India at present, but amongst the lower classes whether it be the petty station master, who obtains a present from the merchant to whom he allots a wagon for his goods or the Police subordinate officer for his assistance in trouble, the practice, if not universal, is very common and can only be cured not by law but by opinion, and such opinion does not at present exist. As regards rahdari, there are octroi taxes levied by certain of the municipalities of Upper India to this day; if goods pass only through there is a refund given, but I have often heard it stated that merchants would prefer a small tax and no refund, so troublesome is it to get the same, chiefly through the necessity of satisfying some one concerned with a present.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 248.

For the first few years after his succession Aurangzeb sate at the Jharokha, as his predecessors had done, but after a time he discontinued this practice. Although religious reasons were given for this, as indeed for almost everything he did, there is very little doubt that other reasons prompted Aurangzeb. It was often very inconvenient for one thing,—again if the Emperor did not appear at the fixed hours, stories of his illness, and if he stayed away successively for several days, of his death got about. Aurangzeb was on various occasions in the early part of his reign seriously indisposed and had to forego for a considerable time attending at the window. Hence much confusion had more than once happened. Then I fancy for a statesman like Aurangzeb this daily appearance was distasteful inasmuch as it involved a great waste of time. All the same this discontinuance seems to have been impolitic. It did away with the personal link between ruler and subject, forged by the fact that once a day at least the former was seen by, and was ready to listen to the latter.

Shortly after Aurangzeb's accession came embassies to him from Persia, Mawar-un-Nahr, the Dutch Eastern Colonies, the Sharif of Mecca, the Prince of Bassora, and Abyssinnia. The last consisted of two Ambassadors, one a slave dealer and the other an Armenian merchant. Bernier's description of it is very amusing. The Abyssinnian King, in spite of his profession of Christianity, was much more of a savage than the Muhammedan rulers whose countries were near his. A large portion of his presents consisted in slaves, boys fit to be made eunuchs, another portion was purchased by the sale of slaves consigned for the purpose to Mecca, a third part consisted of two elephants' tusks filled with civet, horses and a zebra. Only a small part of this wealth reached Delhi. The slaves sold badly at Mecca, a number of those intended as a present to Aurangzeb died on the way, so did several of the horses and the zebra, and while they were at the port of Surat, Sivaji, the Mahratta, came and looted the town and with the town most of their goods. So they came to Delhi in a miserable plight and were told by the people of that town that they were lucky in having so good an excuse as the sack of Surat to hide their nakedness and that by reason of this excuse they were able to beg for provisions and clothes. All the same Aurangzeb duly received them in audience, made them considerable presents in cash which they spent in India mainly in the purchase of cloth, which article was in those days at a great premium in Abyssinnia and sent them away contented. Bernier wanted to buy the Armenian's illegitimate son from him, to which the father at first consented but subsequently broke his word, demanding a much higher price than he had first asked. This seems to have lessened the friendship between the two, and Bernier complains of the ambassadors having promised Aurangzeb to intercede with their King to allow a broken down mosque to be rebuilt, and also for their having asked for a Koran and other Muhammedan religious books for their Master—matters which at the present day would not be subject to adverse comment. As to the Mecca and Bassora Embassies, these, Bernier says, obviously came only for the sake of the present to be given in return; so but little notice was taken of them. The Dutch Embassy which was well appointed and well served, came in order to obtain orders from Aurangzeb to the local officials not to molest them in their trade and in this they were fairly successful, but it was at the expense of Monsieur Adrican, their ambassador's secretary, who died at Agra, as also did various of the retinue.

More important in the eyes of the Court, were the Embassies from Mawar-un-Nahr and from Persia. Bernier was present at the reception of the first and so describes it.

“They made their reverence at a considerable distance from him after the Indian custom, putting thrice their hands upon their heads, and as often letting them down to the ground. Then they approached so near, that Aurangzeb himself might very well have taken their letters immediately from their hands; but yet it was an Omrah that took and opened them, and gave them to him. He forthwith read them with a very grave countenance; and afterwards commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroider'd Vest, a Turban, and a girdle of silk in embroidery, which is that which they call Ser-Apah, that is, an habit from head to foot. After this their presents were called for, which consisted in some boxes of choice Lapis Lazulis, divers Camels with long hair, several gallant horses, some camel-loads of fresh-fruit, as apples, pears, raisins, and melons; for 'tis chiefly Usbec which furnishes these sorts of fruit, eaten at Delhi (all the winter long), and in many loads of dry fruit, as prunes of Bokhara, Aprecocks, Raisins without any stones that appeared, and two other sorts of Raisins, black and white, very large and good. Aurangzeb was not wanting to declare how much he was satisfied with the generosity of the Khans, and much commended the beauty and rarity of the Fruit, Horses, and Camels; and after he had a little entertained them of the state of the Academy of Samarkand, and of the fertility of their country, abounding in so many rare and excellent things, he desired them to go and repose themselves, intimating withall, that he should be very glad to see them often.”* Bernier remarks that they had no objection to make their reverence after the Indian custom though it had something of slavish in it. Throughout the East extreme professions of humility are not despised as they are with Englishmen and what seems to the latter as beneath the dignity of man is to the Eastern but a respectful salutation. Although the Uzbek Ambassadors were thus received with due honour, they were not allowed to depart in a hurry. To have permitted this would have been totally opposite to Eastern Court practice, where so far from punctuality being the politeness of Kings, no one is considered as being possessed of dignity, who does not show it by keeping others waiting. The Ambassadors had to stay in Delhi four months and during that time there was much sickness amongst them, caused so Bernier tells us chiefly by their filthy method of living and their poor eating. He went to dine with them once and found that their main food was horse flesh. They hardly talked at all during their meal, in this resembling other Easterns, but after dinner bragged much of their skill with the bow and of their women. These latter they praised not for their beauty or their skill in keeping the house but for their prowess as warriors. At last they were let go and carried off very valuable presents both in cash and kind, the latter consisting chiefly of embroidered cloth. Last of all came the Persian Embassy. The Persian Kings, ever since there commenced to be a national dynasty, had always considered themselves to be the greatest Kings of the East and under their great King Shah Abbas who reigned the first half of the seventeenth century and who died only shortly before Aurangzeb's accession, had a good claim to be so considered. Such a kingdom could not be expected to be over-speedy in the despatch of an Embassy, nor when despatched could it be over speedy in its movements. Majestically it came; majestically it was received. Bernier describes the reception thus "Meantime, on the day of the Entry, this Ambassador was received with all possible respect: The Bazars, through which he passed, were all new painted, and the Cavalry attending on the way for above the length of a whole league. Many Omrahs accompanied him with Music, Tymbals, and Trumpets, and when he entered into the Fortresse, or the Palace of the King, the Guns went off. Aurangzeb received him with much civility, and was content that he should make his Adresse to him after the Persian mode, receiving also, without any scruple, immediately from his hands the Letters of his King; which out of respect he lifted up even to his head, and afterwards read them with a grave and serious countenance: Which done he caused an embroider'd Vest to be brought, together with a rich Turban and Girdle, commanding it to be put on him in his presence. A little after it was intimated to him, that he might order his Present to be brought in, which consisted of five and twenty as handsome Horses as ever I saw, led, and cover'd with embroider'd trappings; and of twenty very stately and lusty Camels, as big as Elephants: Moreover of a good number of Boxes said to be full of most excellent Rose-water, and of a certain distilled water, very precious, and esteemed highly cordial: besides there were display'd five or six very rich and very large Tapisseries, and some embroider'd pieces exceeding Noble, wrought in small flowers, so small and delicate, that I know not whether in all Europe any such can be met with. To all this were added four Damaskin'd Swords, with as many Poyards, all cover'd with Jewels; as also five or six harnesses of Horses, which were much esteem'd, being also very fine and rich, the stuff being raised with rich embroidery set with small pearls, and very fair Turcoises of the old Rock

* Bernier, II, p. 3.

It was observ'd, that Aurangzeb beheld this present very attentively; that he admired the beauty and rarity of every piece, and that several times he extolled the Generosity of the King of Persia; assigning to the Ambassador a place among his chief Omrahs. And after he had entertained him a while with a discourse about the inconveniences and hardships of his Voyage, he dismissed him, and made instance, that he should come every day to see him."*

There were no quarrels as to the method of coming to the royal presence and of the method of salutation as there had been in Shah Jahan's days when the latter tried to force the Persian Ambassadors to salute him in Indian fashion, but things do not seem to have run altogether smoothly. Stories were about that the King of Persia had written strong letters of reproach to Aurangzeb, complaining of his conduct to his father, to his brother Dara Shikoh, of his having taken to himself the title of Alamgir and the like. This, Bernier rightly remarks, was not likely. Unless the Persian King had wanted war he would not have sent such messages; and if he had so wanted, we may be sure that it would have come about. But all the same Aurangzeb was not altogether pleased with the Embassy for Bernier tells us that—"Two or three daies after he had dismissed him, he made a rumour to be spread abroad, that the Ambassador had caused the ham-strings of the presented horses to be cut; and the Ambassador being yet upon the frontiers, he made him return all the Indian slaves which he carried along with him, of which he had a prodigious number.'*"

---

* Bernier, p. 63.

NOTE.—"They say, that Shah Jahan seeing that the Courtship and promises made to their Ambassador were not able to prevail with him, so as to make him perform his salute after the Indian mode, he devised this artifice; he commanded to shut the Great Gate of the Court of the Am-khas, where he was to receive him, and to leave only open the Wicket, through which one man could not pass but very difficultly, by stooping and holding down his head, as the fashion is when one maketh an Indian reverence, to the end that it might be said, he had made the Ambassador put himself in a posture which was something lower than the Indian Salam or Salute; but that Ambassador being aware of this trick, came in with his Back foremost: And that Shah Jahan, out of indignation to see himself caught, told him, Eh-Bed-bakt, Thou Wretch, dost thou think thou comest into a stable of Asses, such as thou art? And that the Ambassador, without any alteration, answered: Who would not think so, seeing such a little door!"—Bernier's History of the Revolution of the Empire of Moguls, p. 72 (1671).

Aurangzeb's relations with states beyond the Indian Continent were of very minor importance. His life's work was almost entirely with Hindustan. And here, he had in the first instance to settle what to do with Amir Jumla, whose help had so largely aided in making him Emperor. We have seen that Amir Jumla had been with Aurangzeb's son in Bengal in the pursuit of Shuja and that he remained faithful when that son for a time revolted from his father. With the recall of the Prince, Amir Jumla was the sole head of the Bengal Army and accordingly he was forthwith made Viceroy of that province and given the title of Khan Khanan. His son, however, was kept with Aurangzeb. The Emperor had too much personal experience of intrigue to allow Amir Jumla the freedom that an Eastern feels when he knows that none of his family are in his superior's power. It is of this son that Bernier writes that though a mere Umra he is still so much respected as his father's son, especially on the Eastern coast, where his father when in the service of the Golkonda Kings had been all powerful, that at Mazulipatam his ships were allowed to come and go without paying any custom due for the goods they brought—no imperial officers daring to demand anything from them. Amir Jumla himself did not live long after he became Viceroy of Bengal, dying in A. D. 1662. His first step after the final disappearing of Shuja was to invade Assam. This country had been almost absolutely unaffected by the Muhammedan invasions of India. Situated in the far East on the banks of a great river, with impenetrable forests, wooded hills and an abnormal rainfall and there being almost no means of communication, its people had worked out a distinct national existence in which an adapted form of Hinduism found its place; but which was in other respects almost entirely local. The burial practices as reported by Khafi Khan remind one of the customs of the Scythians of old (and indeed of many other of the earlier and less advanced races). "When the Raja of that country or a great Zamindar dies, they dig a large tomb or apartment in the earth, and in it they place his wives and concubines, as also his horses and equipage, carpets, vessels of gold and silver, grain, &c., all such things as are used in that country, the jewels worn by wives and nobles, perfumes and fruits, sufficient to last for several days. These they call the provisions of his journey to the next world, and when they are collected the door is closed upon them."*

* Bernier, p. 70.

Our author tells us that these funeral tombs were opened by Khan Khanan's soldiers and that they obtained much booty—similarly to the case of ancient Egypt, such tombs have been from time immemorial the hunting ground of the robber. The story of the invasion is one common to many invasions where the people are weak but nature strong. The defending forces are easily brushed aside, the capital is reached, but there success ends. What the defenders cannot do, nature does. In this case nature's work was efficiently done by the rains. Amir Jumla's force had perforce to go into cantonments and there suffered from the climate with its various diseases and even from want of food. To such an extent did discontent arise that the troops were prepared to leave Amir Jumla to his fate and decamp. Learning this, he made a virtue of necessity and ordered a retreat. The Assamese thereupon attacked the Muhammedan forces, but these were still capable of fighting and consequently the Assamese were defeated. This induced their Raja to agree to a peace whereby he gave up a few frontier towns and paid a considerable tribute to Aurangzeb. He also agreed, so Khafi Khan tells us, "to present fifty elephants and one of his ugly daughters to the Emperor." It was on the return march that Amir Jumla died at Khizapur on the frontier of Kuch Behar.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 264—65.

Another great Muhammedan nobleman who, during the fraternal wars, might have become a King maker was Mahabat Khan, the Viceroy or the Prince of Kabul. He seems, however, to have contented himself with protesting against Shah Jahan's captivity and with getting its rigour alleviated. After Mir Jumla's death his son Amin Khan was sent to Kabul in place of Mahabat Khan to rule the Afghans in their Native home, but he found it, as so many others have since found it, anything but an easy matter to do. On one occasion they took him by surprise in the Khaibar Pass, and so badly handled him that he was glad to escape almost alone and leave his troops to their fate. Mahabat Khan lived till well into the seventies and died while about to visit Court. Popular rumour suggested he was poisoned, but there is nothing really to substantiate this. With him went the last of the great nobles of Shah Jahan's reign; Aurangzeb ever desired to reign alone, but there is little doubt that his Empire lost in stability by the loss of experienced Statesmen of the rank of Amir Jumla and Mahabat Khan, who were almost entirely independent in reality but who maintained rigorously Moghul rule in the Marches of the Empire.

The early days of Aurangzeb's reign saw him more than once seriously ill and indeed on one occasion it was not expected that he would recover. In later years his health seems to have been better or at least his fits of illness came less frequently and less severely. In his early reign fear of his father kept him generally not far from Agra, though he spent one summer in Kashmir. Later on he became as great a wanderer as any of his ancestors, but his journeyings were always South towards the Peninsula which he ever hoped to subdue, though never did he reach success.

II.

The Military History of the reign is chiefly concerned with three wars or properly speaking series of wars, wars with the Rajputs, owing to the Emperor's attempt to propagate his religion forcibly amongst them, wars with the Muhammedan Kingdoms of Bijapur and Golkonda, which ended in their overthrow and finally wars with the Mahrattas, which survived Aurangzeb and continued till the Empire was ground down to the dust. I have already in my first volume described briefly the states of Rajputana and the Rajputs; I have also said something about the Deccan Kingdoms of which Bijapur and Golkonda were at the time of Aurangzeb's accession to the Delhi throne, the sole survivors, but I have hitherto had no need to say anything of the Mahrattas. Up to the middle of the seventeenth century the part they played in the history of India is quite subordinate. But from this period on they gradually take a more and more forward place, till by the middle of the eighteenth century they were the foremost power in India. When they lost that pride of the place it was not by reason of any other Indian race conquering them. Foreign powers, first the Afghans, then the English, alone were capable of performing this. Paniput fought in 1761 A. D. between them and the Afghans dashed to pieces their hope of establishing a Pan-Indian Mahratta Empire, and Assaye in 1803 established as the Pan-Indian power a whitefaced race to take the place which once had been held by the Chagatai Turks of Delhi and which had become for many years vacant.

Maharashtra, the country of the Mabrattas, is situated in Western India south of the Taptee and stretching almost as far south as Goa. Its boundaries are indeterminate, but, broadly speaking, Maharashtra, the native land of the Mabrattas, is situated on the eastern side of the Western Ghats in the north-western part of the Peninsula, over the western half of its breadth. Between the Ghats and the sea is the Konkan in which the Mahrattas are only one of the various races dwelling there. At the time of which I write in the hills themselves and in the highlands to the east of them, the people of the country, though Muhammedans were to be found scattered here and there, were nearly all Mahrattas. The Ghats are high hills with many an isolated top and consequently afford most excellent situations for forts wherever a water supply can be had. This is not unfrequently obtained from local springs, and where these do not exist, the rainfall from June to September is sufficient to supply a small garrison with quite a sufficient supply.

provided proper foresight as regards the preparation of cisterns and the storage of water be observed. Khafi Khan speaks of Sivaji as residing in a country where all the hills arise to the sky and the jungles are full of trees and bushes. Such a land is eminently fitted to rear a warlike and enduring race, and so the Mahrattas had long before proved themselves to be. They were to be found in great numbers serving as light cavalry (Bargirs) in the Deccan Muhammedan states, particularly in Ahmednuggur and Bijanuggur, and seem to have made excellent skirmishers. It was only in Aurangzeb's time that the race became self-conscious of its powers and stepped forward, not only to obtain its own independence but to conquer far and wide. That it ever did this was almost entirely the work of one remarkable man, of the National hero Sivaji. Muhammedan historians tell us that he was descended from an Udaipur Rajput who had formed a connection with a woman of inferior caste and consequently had to leave his native home and to emigrate to the Deccan. Whether there be any truth in this story, it is hard to say; probably there is not. Anyhow the first person to rise to importance in his family was his grand-father Mallaji Bhonsla. This man entered into the service of the King of Ahmednuggur before that state was conquered by Akbar and thereby obtained for himself some position and fortune. He is said to have been a devout worshipper of Mahadeo, but, according to Mahratta story, after his wife had not given birth to any children for many years, two were born to him in two successive years owing to the intercession and prayers of a Muhammedan Saint, Shah Sharif. Hence the elder was called—so the story ran—Shahji—ji being the Hindustani honorific. It is also told that one Jadu Rao, a Mahratta nobleman at the Ahmednuggur Court, having on one festive occasion laughingly said to the guests that his little daughter and Shahji would make a fine pair, Shahji being then five years old and the couple playing about at the time, Mallaji turned round to the people there and claimed the girl as Shahji's future wife. Jadu Rao was greatly annoyed at the upstart's presumption, but all the same the couple did eventually marry. Before this Mallaji grew rich—according to the legend by reason of Bhowani, the female counterpart of the God Mahadeo, having shown to him the whereabouts of a large treasure, more probably, as Duff in his history suggests, by means of robbery in the troubled days at the end of the sixteenth century in the Ahmednuggur state. The Goddess in the story is said to have declared to Mallaji "that there shall be one of thy family who shall become a King; he shall be endowed with the qualities and attributes of Sambh;* he shall re-establish and preserve justice in Maharashtra, and remove all that molest Brahmins, and violate the temple of the gods, his reign shall form an epoch, and his posterity shall mount the throne for twenty-seven generations."†

Shahji rose to fame and to a considerable territorial position in Ahmednuggur after Malik Ambar's death. At one time intriguing with the faineant Kings of the State, at another time with Bijapur, and again with the Imperial authorities, he managed to fish not unsuccessfully in the troubled waters of the time, and finally was employed in the Bijapur service as second in command in an expedition to the Karnatic, where he obtained a large Jaghir and where he remained for the greater part of the remainder of his life. Before going there he had married a second time. By his first wife he had two children, Sambha-ji and Sivaji; the former he took with him; the second was left behind along with his mother between whom and the father disagreements seem to have sprung up, and who for several years before the Karnatic expedition had ceased to live with her husband. And so it was that Sivaji knew hardly anything of his father. He was born in 1627 at the fort of Sheoneri about fifty miles north of Poona. From 1630 to 1636 his mother was living with her father separate from Shahji, and in the last named year she met him at Bijapur, where they both went to attend the marriage of Sivaji who was married according to Hindu custom as a child. After this she returned to her own home and Shahji in the following year started for the Karnatic. By the time he went on this expedition he had obtained a considerable quantity of landed property and in particular was the Jaghirdar of Poona and Topa.

---

* A name of Mahadeo.

† Duff, Vol. I, p. 91.

This former place was not the town it now is, but from its excellent natural position at the head of the Ghats it must always have been a place of considerable importance. Here it was that Sivaji and his mother went to reside; and here also lived Dadaji, Shahji's headman, as regards his Maharashtra estates. This Dadaji seems to have been honest and intelligent, and he brought Sivaji up in the most approved Mahratta fashion. He did not indeed have him taught reading and writing, for such teaching would not have been according to Mahratta precedent, but Sivaji was brought up to the use of arms, to a minute knowledge of the ritual of his religion and to an understanding of the duties of his position both as landlord and as petty feudal chief. All such teaching did Sivaji zealously imbibe and in after years he showed himself alike a good warrior, a good administrator (after his own methods) and a good Hindu. He began his career at an age when boys in Western countries are still at school. By attaching to himself a number of Nawabis, the inhabitants of the Ghat Valleys, who did not belong to the higher Mahratta castes, he with their assistance possessed one by one of various hill-forts, none of which were at the time of great importance, but some of which were hereafter fortified so as to throw the greatest obstacles in the way of an attacking force. The first of these forts was Torna, which place fell into his possession peacefully in the year 1646. Close to this fort he built another, famed hereafter as Rajgarh. In the next year or two he seized Kondaneh, the name of which he changed into Singhar (the lion fort) and Purandhar. In none of these cases was there any fighting. Bribery and treachery were the means used. In the case of Purandhar, the holders of the fort were three brothers; they quarrelled and called in Sivaji as arbitrator. His method of arbitration was to seize the fort himself. Stories are told of him, as of his father, that he discovered much treasure by the aid of Bhowani. My readers may believe as much of this as they choose.

Dadaji, his guardian, was much troubled by his ward's proceedings; and found himself totally unable to control him. He died, however, before his ward had far advanced in his career. It is told that shortly before his death, when he found that he was unable to persuade him to live a life of obedience to the Bijapur rulers " he sent for him and advised him to prosecute his plans of independence to protect Brahmins, kine and cultivators ; to preserve the temples of the Hindus from violation ; and to follow the fortune which lay before him."*

Messengers from his father arrived shortly after his guardian's death. They came to demand the income of the Jaghirs. Sivaji sent them away empty-handed and on fresh emissaries coming, after various evasions, flatly told them that his father would get nothing from his Jaghirs in Maharashtra, he must depend upon his Carnatic properties for his income. At this time he was hardly over twenty years of age. Like Akbar he developed very quick and very early. The Bijapur ruler hardly took any notice of Sivaji at this stage of his career. This Muhammedan ruler was busy building and amusing himself at his capital and had no time to spare in order to bother about a mischievous Jaghirdar, whose deeds were performed in a corner of the kingdom, in a land about which the ruler cared but little. And, in addition to this, Sivaji took care always to have smart agents at Court, who did not hesitate to bribe freely all whose business it was to look into his misdoings. Khafi Khan tells us how at this time Sivaji whom he describes as "for craft and trickery the sharp son of the devil, the father of fraud," seized three pergannahs belonging to an Arab immigrant Mullah Ahmad while this man was away on a visit to Shah Jahan. And this, says Khafi Khan, "was the beginning of that system of violence which he and his descendants have spread over the rest of the Konkan and all the territory of the Deccan. Whenever he heard of a prosperous town or of a district inhabited by thriving cultivators, he plundered it and took possession of it. Before the Jaghirdars in those troublous times could appeal to Bijapur, he had sent in his own account of the matter, with presents and offerings, charging the Jaghirdars or proprietors with some offence which he had felt called upon to punish, and offering to pay some advanced amount for the lands on their being attached to his own jaghir, or to pay their revenues direct to the Government. He communicated these matters to the officials at Bijapur, who in those disturbed times took but little heed of what any one did. So when the Jaghirdar's complaint arrived, he obtained no redress, because no one took any notice of it. The country of the Deccan was never free from commotions and outbreaks, and so the officials, the raiyats, and the soldiery, under the influence of surrounding circumstances, were greedy, stupid and frivolous; thus they applied the axe to their feet with their own hands, and threw their wealth and property to the winds. The greed of the officials increased, especially in those days when the authority of the rulers was interrupted, or their attention diverted. In accordance with the wishes of this disturber, the reins of authority over that country fell into his hands, and he at length became the most notorious of all the rebels."*

---

* Duff, Vol. I, p. 133.

Although Sivaji for a long time escaped notice by reason of his exploits being performed far away from the capital and owing to his astuteness and skill in bribery, he could not expect to be so for ever, and when he began to seize seaport towns, the Bijapur Government thought it time to put him down, and the step it took to do so was highly characteristic. Shahji was seized according to instructions by another Mahratta, Baji Ghorpuraik of Mundhaul, also serving in the Carnatic, brought to Court and directed to stop his son's rebellions. His asseverations that Sivaji was rebelling against him as well as against the Bijapur ruler were not believed, and at last, when his attempts to bring in Sivaji availed nothing, he was shut up in a stone dungeon with only a small opening, and was informed that if his son did not submit within a certain time, the opening would be closed and he would be left to die of hunger. Sivaji on learning of this did not, as he was advised to do, submit, but on the other hand entered into Shah Jahan's service and it was at the latter's instance that, we are told, Shahji was set free from the dungeon; all the same he stayed a semi-prisoner in Bijapur for four years. At the end of this time he was allowed to return to the Karnatic which had fallen into a state of great disorder and there his eldest son Sambhaji was shortly afterwards killed. As soon as Shahji was out of the clutches of the Bijapur authorities, Sivaji, who in the meantime had done nothing to compromise his father, began again to give trouble. His first big attempt was against the Jowli State, ruled by a Mahratta, Raja Chunder Rao, a feudatory of the Bijapur power. This Raja was invited by Sivaji to join him in rebelling. On his declining, one of Sivaji's envoys finding him off his guard, assassinated him, the Raja's brother being at the time stabbed to the heart by another envoy. During the confusion that followed Jowli was attacked on all sides by Sivaji's forces and after a brief struggle passed into his hands. It was very shortly after this event that Aurangzeb, then commanding the Imperial forces in the Deccan, marched against Bijapur. Sivaji acted in this campaign as an officer of the Moghuls or rather affected so to act, for he did nothing or next to nothing for anyone save himself, and while Aurangzeb was besieging Bijapur, took advantage of the absence of the Moghul troops to sack Junir and to make an attempt which did not succeed on Ahmednuggur. The civil wars on the North soon called Aurangzeb away; the State of Bijapur was governed by a minor, and internal dissensions were rife; so by the year 1658 Sivaji found that he had a free hand to preserve whatever schemes he might please. His first big attempt, however, was unsuccessful. It was then, and continued to be afterwards, a cardinal part of his policy to seize the Konkan, and particularly the seaports along its coast. The most important of these was Jinjira, which was ruled by a semi-independent ruler, partly of African birth, known as the Sidi; Fateh Khan was the name of the Sidi at the time, and he inflicted in 1659 the first real defeat that Sivaji's forces had experienced since he had become a power in the land, and this defeat was so effectual that it was long before Sivaji was able to trouble seriously Jinjira again.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 257.

Bijapur at this time A. D. 1659 had a temporary cessation from internal strife and the rulers accordingly determined it was time to put a check on Sivaji and his incessant raids. For this purpose they chose Afzal Khan, a distinguished and courageous officer, as Khafi Khan calls him, but vain, and contemptuous of a wretched Kafir like Sivaji. He is said to have boasted on leaving the capital that he would bring back the insignificant rebel and cast him in chains under the footstool of the throne. Afzal Khan seems to have driven back some of Sivaji's troops at first, but the difficulties of the country made an approach to Sivaji's head-quarters at Pertabgarh difficult, and he was led by messengers from the Mahratta Chief to believe that the latter was about to surrender. In this belief Afzal Khan sent a Mahratta Brahmin in his service, Pantoji Gopinath, to Pertabgarh where he met Sivaji and discussed the terms on which the Bijapur Government would treat with him. To Pantoji, Sivaji in darbar gave an evasive answer, professing to be a faithful servant of Bijapur and to being only too desirous to be restored to favour, but in the middle of the night he visited secretly the Brahmin Ambassador and there poured out his real thoughts.

“All he had done,” so he said, “was for the sake of Hindus and the Hindu faith; that he was called on by Bhowani herself to protect Brahmins and kine, to punish the violators of their temples and their gods, and to resist the enemies of their religion; that it became him as a Brahmin to assist in what was already declared by the deity; and that here, amongst his caste and countrymen, he should hereafter live in comfort and affluence.”*

In addition to this appeal to Pantoji's religious feelings, he also appealed to his avarice, promising him in return for his aid villages in Mau for ever. To this twofold appeal Pantoji yielded, and it was through him that Sivaji managed to get Afzal Khan to meet him at a solitary rendezvous, there to settle the terms of submission which he would obtain from the Bijapur Government. Afzal Khan fell into the trap. To the place appointed he came with one single armed servant and with no arms or armour himself of any sort save the sword which was customarily worn out of doors by a Muhammedan officer. Fifteen hundred troops of his troops were left at Pantoji's suggestion some distance away and he advanced to the place of meeting and to his doom in an open palki. Sivaji, on the other hand, had made all his plans. Before accomplishing them he obtained his mother's blessing and performed his religious duties. Then he armed himself with chain armour and concealed in his right sleeve a dagger and in his fingers a wagnak, a small stabbing weapon with four points. All round the place of conference he posted troops with orders to attack as soon as a horn was blown and the Pertabgarh guns announced his safety. Going to the place of conference also with only one armed follower, he assumed an air of humility and submission so that Afzal Khan got entirely off his guard. Then, all of a sudden jumping on Afzal Khan with the fierceness of a tiger, he stuck the wagnak in the latter's bowels, and though the Muhammedan was able to strike a blow with his sword, yet the chain armour prevented any injury, and after a short fight with the follower, who was cut down, Afzal Khan's head was struck off and carried away by some of Sivaji's followers who had by this time arrived. The horn was then blown, the Pertabgarh cannon on its sound were fired and the concealed Mahrattas attacked the royal troops. These without their leader were, as Eastern troops too often are, in such cases, but a disorganised mob. They were utterly routed, many were killed, the whole were scattered and many threw themselves on Sivaji's mercy. This he showed, and so it came about that many Mahrattas up to then in Bijapur service became his best of followers. By this exploit his name amongst his fellow Mahrattas became for ever glorious, the Muhammedan historian, on the other hand, considering it as the basest treachery. Whether they would have done so in case the positions had been reversed is a matter of doubt.

* Duff, Vol. I, pp. 169 to 170.

In judging of an action of this kind, in order to come to a fair decision, it is only right to remember the conditions of the time and the average man of the time's opinion in such matters. Treachery—which is simply trickery written large—has loomed large in the history of the world and has in most places and times only met with the faintest reputation. In early Greek History, the heinousness of a breach of faith does not consist in the act itself, but in the violation of the oath which accompanied it. It is the breaking of the promise made and confirmed by a special ritual which brings down the wrath of the gods. So we read in the Iliad, how the gods were wrath at the Trojans breaking the truce between them and the Greeks, though they were incited to do this by Athene and Zeus himself. And the idea of the rightness of the keeping of one's word, irrespective of the imprecation, is one which has only gradually grown and impressed itself on the consciences of men. Scotland's great hero Robert the Bruce slays the red Comyn in the midst of a peaceful chat by the High Altar at Kircudbright. And up to the present day, slimness, smartness, if not praised, is highly resorted to by diplomatists, the class of men who, as it has been wittily said, lie abroad for the sake of their country. And so we must not be too hard on Sivaji. There does not seem to have been any oath which he broke, and so the older idea of the taking of the holy name in vain was not involved in his act. However base it may seem to persons who have been trained to look on deceit as the greatest of vices, to the Mahratta, and I may say to the Indians in general of that age, who considered that all things were fair in war, it was simply an instance of excessive slimness. Treachery of this sort was indeed a constant means used in the India of the seventeenth century and in this art the Mahrattas far surpassed any other class of man. When summing up Sivaji's character later on, I shall have something more to say on this head; at present all that it is necessary to say is that the peculiarity of the act was not the treachery, but the wonderful success which attended it, the whole of the Bijapur force, which in open field could easily have crushed Sivaji, being thereby disorganised and overthrown.

The war with Bijapur continued with varying results during the next three years. At first all the advantage was with Sivaji. An army sent by the King under Rustom Khan was defeated, and Sivaji seized various forts, including Panala Pandangarh and plundered the seaport of Rajapur. In fine, as Khafi Khan says, "Fortune so favoured this treacherous, worthless man, that his forces increased and he grew more powerful every day. He erected new forts, and employed himself in settling his own territories, and in plundering those of Bijapur. He attacked the caravans which came from distant parts and appropriated to himself the goods and the women. But he made it a rule that wherever his followers went plundering, they should do no harm to the mosques, the Book of God, or the women of any one. Whenever a copy of the sacred Koran came into his hands, he treated it with respect, and gave it to some of his Mussalman followers. When the women of any Hindu or Muhammedan were taken prisoners by his men, and they had no friend to protect them, he watched over them until their relations came with a suitable ransom to buy their liberty. Whenever he found out that a woman was a slave-girl, he looked upon her as being the property of her master, and appropriated her to himself. He laid down the rule that whenever a place was plundered, the goods of poor people, pul-siyah (copper money), and vessels of brass and copper, should belong to the man who found them; but other articles, gold and silver, coined or uncoined, gems, valuable stuffs and jewels, were not to belong to the finder, but were to be given up without the smallest deduction to the officers, and to be by them paid over to Sivaji's government."*

As to this latter point, further notice of it will be taken later when we shall point out in detail how the organisation of plunder was the cardinal feature of Mahratta policy. After a while, however, fortune ceased to smile. Sidi Johur (not to be confounded with any of the Sidis of Jinjira) marched against Sivaji. So did Afzal Khan's son, Fazl Muhammad Khan. The former pinned Sivaji into the fort of Parn Panalla and there besieged him for four months. The Mahratta again had resort to artifice. Meeting Sidi Johur, he pretended to be treating for a surrender: then having lulled the Bijapur general's suspicion, he slipped through the besieged at night and was far on his way to Rangna, his place of refuge, before his escape was discovered. His retreat was covered by some of the bravest of his men; many of whom, including their leader Baji Purviz, gave their lives for their Chief. Again fortune came to his aid. Sidi Johur got suspicious of the Bijapur ruler, revolted and was slain; and the Bijapur main forces instead of being directed towards the Konkan were despatched to the Carnatic. Sivaji took advantage of this to suddenly attack and slay Baji Ghorepurai, who had formerly betrayed his father Shahji to the Bijapur power. This act greatly delighted his father who returned about this time from the Carnatic.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 260-61.

Sivaji, who was gradually becoming more and more rigid in his performance of the rites prescribed by the Hindu religion, received his father with the greatest of respect, "went several miles to meet him, dismounted from his horse and saluted him with the obeisance due by a servant to his sovereign; insisted on walking by the side of his father's palanquin, and would not sit in his presence until repeatedly commanded."*

Through the mediation of his father peace was made between Sivaji and Bijapur A. D. 1662, the main term being that Sivaji was left in undisturbed possession of the Konkan from Kallian to Goa. This peace was much needed by Sivaji, for already the Moghuls were pressing him hard. As soon as Aurangzeb had been fairly seated on the Imperial throne, his troops were set in motion against Sivaji. Two years before this peace they had besieged and forced to surrender after two months' siege, Chakna, one of the Mahratta northern forts. Already in this campaign they had experience of the warfare which the Mahrattas were to carry on with the Moghul troops for almost the next century. "The daring freebooter Sivaji ordered his followers to attack and plunder the baggage of Amir-ul-Umara's army wherever they met with it. When the Amir was informed of this, he appointed 4,000 horse, under experienced officers, to protect the baggage. But every day, and in every march, Sivaji's Dakhinis swarmed round the baggage, and falling suddenly upon it like Cossacks, they carried off horses, camels, men, and whatever they could secure, until they became aware of the approach of the troops."† As to the troubles and hardships to which the Imperial troops were put during the siege the Muhammedan historian is quite pathetic. "The rains in that country last nearly five months, and fall night and day, so that people cannot put their heads out of their houses. The heavy masses of clouds change day into night, so that lamps are often needed, for without them one man cannot see another of his party. But for all that the muskets were rendered useless, the powder spoilt, and the bows deprived of their strings, the siege was vigorously pressed, and the walls of the fortress were breached by the fire of the guns. The garrison were hard pressed and troubled, but in dark nights they sallied forth into the trenches and fought with surprising boldness. Sometimes the forces of the freebooter on the outside, combined with those inside in making a simultaneous attack in broad daylight, and placed the trenches in great danger."† However, the siege ended favourably and the Amir-ul-Umara, after capturing this fort and seizing various others, finally took up his head-quarters at Poona. By this time Sivaji had made his peace with Bijapur and so could turn his whole attention to the Moghuls. As usual, he trusted to cunning and not to force. "A regulation had been made that no person, especially no Mahratta, should be allowed to enter the city or the lines of the army without a pass, whether armed or unarmed, excepting persons in the Imperial service. No Mahratta horseman was taken into the service. Sivaji, beaten and dispirited, had retired into mountains difficult of access, and was continually changing his position. One day a party of Mahrattas, who were serving as foot-soldiers, went to the Kotwal, and applied for a pass to admit 200 Mahrattas, who were accompanying a marriage party. A boy dressed up as a bridegroom, and escorted by a party of Mahrattas with drums and music, entered the town early in the evening. On the same day another party was allowed to enter the town on the report that a number of the enemy had been made prisoners at one of the outposts, and that another party was bringing them in pinioned and bare-headed; holding them by ropes and abusing and reviling them as they went along. They proceeded to the place agreed upon, where the whole party met and put on arms. At midnight they went to the cookhouse, which was near the women's apartments. Between the two there was a small window stopped up with mud and bricks. They proceeded by a way well known to them, and got into the kitchen. It was the month of the fast. Some of the cooks were awake, and busy in preparing the vessels for cooking, and others were asleep. The assailants approached noiselessly, and, as far as they were able, they attacked and killed unawares those who were awake; those who were asleep they butchered as they lay. So no great alarm was raised. They then quickly set to work about opening the closed windows in the palace. The noise of their pickaxes and the cries of the slaughtered men awoke a servant who was sleeping in a room next to the wall of the cookhouse. He went to the Amir-ul-Umara (Shayista Khan) and informed him of what he had heard. The Amir scolded him, and said that it was only the cooks who had got up to do their work. Some of the maid servants then came, one after another, to say that a hole was being made through the wall. The Amir then jumped up in great alarm, and seized a bow, some arrows, and a spear. Just then some Mahrattas came up in front, and the Amir hit one with an arrow; but he got up to the Amir, and cut off his thumb. Two Mahrattas fell into a reservoir of water, and Amir-ul-Umara brought down another with his spear. In the midst of the confusion two slave girls took Shayista Khan, Amir-ul-Umara, by the hand, and dragged him from the scene of strife to a place of safety. A number of Mahrattas got into the guard-house, and killed every one they found on his pillow, whether sleeping or awake, and said: "This is how they keep watch!" Some men got into the nakar-khana, and in the name of the Amir-ul-Umara ordered the drums to be beaten: so such a din was raised that one man could not hear another speak, and the noise made by the assailants grew higher. They closed the doors. Abul-Fath Khan, son of Shayista Khan, a brave young man, rushed forward and killed two or three men, but was himself wounded and killed. A man of importance, who had a house behind the palace of Amir-ul-Umara, hearing the outcry, and finding the doors shut, endeavoured to escape by a rope ladder from a window. He was old and feeble, and somewhat resembled Shayista Khan. The Mahrattas mistook him for the Amir-ul-Umara, killed him, and cut off his head. They also attacked two of the Amir's women. One of them was so cut about that her remains were carried in a basket which served for her coffin. The other recovered, although she had received thirty or forty wounds. The Mahrattas gave no thought to plundering, but made their way

* Duff, Vol. I, p. 189.

† Elliot, Vol. 7, p. 261.

---

† Elliot, Vol. 7, p. 262.

Raja Jeswant Singh was at the time jointly in command, though nominally subordinate to the Amir-ul-Umara. The two leaders entered into mutual recriminations after Sivaji's daring exploit, a fact which did not make for mutual action. Aurangzeb determined to recall them both. Eventually, Jeswant Singh was left in the Deccan, but the Amir-ul-Umara transferred to Bengal. To the Deccan was now sent in chief command Prince Muazzam, the king's son; along with this Raja came Jai Singh, the famous Rajput Chief and Dilir Khan. In the meantime Sivaji had again fallen out with Bijapur and had again begun to ravage this kingdom. Once he embarked in February 1665 on a ship, one of his improvised fleet, on a plundering expedition down the West Coast. "On this voyage Sivaji was detained longer than he expected; a strong gale drove him down the coast, and the north-west winds prevented his return for many days. This delay was one of several circumstances by which his tutelary goddess is said to have shown her displeasure at this expedition: the only naval enterprise on which he, in person, embarked."* The lesson was sufficient for him. The sea was not his element. Before this his father Shahji died A. D. 1664 in the Carnatic, and Sivaji, his eldest living son, performed his funeral ceremonies with great pomp. His younger brother took possession of the Carnatic properties to which, however, Sivaji laid claim.

Sivaji in the year 1664 A. D. attacked and captured Surat, the chief seaport belonging to the Moghuls. The capture was complete; so was the loot: only the British and Dutch factories resisted him and so escaped plunder. About this time he also seized several ships, carrying pilgrims to Mecca, and fitted them specially fitted to raise Aurangzeb's ire.

Jai Singh, unlike Jeswant Singh, meant business. When coming to the Deccan there was no more of the makeshifts which marked so much of the Deccan Moghul General's proceedings. His army was supposed to be intended for the purpose of entering Bijapur, but it attacked unprovokedly the Maratha Kingdom.

was first of all besieged and for a time it maintained a short resistance, during which its commandant was shot by Dilir Khan with an arrow. All round the country was harried.* "At Sivapur, which was built by Sivaji, and at the forts of Kandana and Kanwarigarh, not one trace of cultivation was left, and cattle out of number were taken. But, on the other hand, the sudden attacks by the enemy, their brilliant successes, their assaults in dark nights, their seizure of the roads and difficult passes, and the firing of the jungles full of trees, severally tried the Imperial forces, and men and beasts in great numbers perished." All the same the pressure continued until Purandhur surrendered. Sivaji's head-quarters, where his wife and many of his relations were, was besieged, and it seemed that at last he was fairly caught. So he thought, too, for after receiving the promise of a safe conduct from Jai Singh—he would hardly have trusted a Muhammedan after his treatment of Afzal Khan—he surrendered to him. Jai Singh was suspicious of Sivaji, and no wonder, and so at the place of meeting was sufficiently guarded to prevent treachery. Before meeting Sivaji, Jai Singh had let the former know the conditions on which he would treat, which were that Sivaji should give up his forts and proceed to wait upon the Emperor. While with the Emperor, Jai Singh assured him that he would be security for his safety and freedom. At the meeting the Raja embraced Sivaji and treated him with the courtesy that ever distinguishes a Rajput Chief. Sivaji himself clasped Jai Singh's hands and said: "I have come as a guilty slave to ask forgiveness, and it is for you either to pardon or to kill me at your pleasure. I will make over my great forts, with the country of the Konkan, to the Emperor's officers, and I will send my son to enter the Imperial service. As for myself, I hope that after the interval of one year, when I have paid my respects to the Emperor, I may be allowed, like other servants of the State who exercise authority in their own provinces, to live with my wife and family in a small fort or two. Whenever and wherever my services are required, I will, on receiving orders, discharge my duty loyally."† Finally * Elliot, Vol. 7, pp. 272-73.

† Elliot, Vol. 7, p. 274.

it was agreed that Sivaji should retain twelve out of the thirty-five forts which he held and that he with his son Sambhaji, then eight years old, should proceed to Court. The father's attendance at the Court was to be temporary but his son's was to be permanent. He was to be enrolled as one of the nobles waiting on the Emperor. And so in A. D. 1666 we find Sivaji and his son with a small escort arrived at Delhi, there to pay their respects to the Emperor in person. When he reached there, Shah Jahan was dead, and Aurangzeb had ceased to fear any rivals. He had not yet completed his plans against Hinduism and many Rajput nobles were still amongst the most assiduous of his courtiers. Arriving near Delhi, instead of being met by persons of the highest rank and office, Sivaji was received only by Kunwar Ram Sing, the son of Jai Sing, and Mukhliz Khan, one of the lesser Moghul nobles. Aurangzeb had him enrolled as a Panj-hazari, but as his son Sambhaji was also given this rank and as Nathuji, another Mahratta chief, also received the same, Sivaji considered himself insulted and did not hesitate to say so. Nor was his anger lessened by what happened when he was presented to Aurangzeb in Durbar. The Emperor who considered the Mahrattas an insignificant clan of mountain robbers, and to whom a Hindu of importance meant solely a Rajput, hardly noticed him on his presentation and allowed him to stay amongst the Panjazaris—quite a considerable and not an over-distinguished body. Sivaji loudly expressed his dissatisfaction to Kunwar Ram Sing and others about the Court. Jai Singh had guaranteed him his personal liberty and this does not seem to have been interfered with, but all the same he was prohibited from coming to Court and a surveillance more or less severe was put on his movements. This did not suit Sivaji at all; any idea he may have had of being considered by Aurangzeb as the indispensable man for the Deccan left him, and the one idea that obsessed him was a return to Mahratta land. To effect this he had resort to stratagem. For a time he pretended to be ill and kept almost entirely to his bed. Then pretending to recover he had large baskets made in which he sent presents of food to various persons in authority as a thanksgiving offering on his recovery. This custom is so common in India that it occasioned no remark. Then having got one of his companions to lie in his bed with his ring on his hand, so that if any prying eyes might peer into his sleeping room they might be satisfied that he was there, he and his son got into two of these baskets and were carried some distance out of Delhi to a spot where their companions awaited them. Swift horses were in readiness and long before the Emperor heard of their escape, they reached Muttra. There Sivaji transformed himself into a fakir and travelled as such, first of all to Benares, where he visited the holy places. At length some months after his escape he got back to the Mountains of his native land. Sambhaji had to be left behind at Allahabad in charge of a Brahmin. This man proved faithful to his trust and in course of time conducted Sambhaji to his father. Thus did Aurangzeb lose the best chance he ever had of quieting the Deccan. There is but little doubt that Sivaji was afraid of the Imperial troops, and that if Aurangzeb had only recognized him as what he really was, the most important man of the Deccan, he would have been content with his position. Joined with an Imperial Prince he would have had but little difficulty in conquering both the States of Bijapur and Golkonda—a conquest which Aurangzeb only effected nearly twenty years later and the whole Deccan would have become, for the time at least, really a part of the Moghul Empire. As it turned out, it was never so, for from this time Sivaji ceased to have any confidence in the Moghuls and Maharashtra became a practically independent kingdom; and so it was that when Bijapur and Golkonda were at last conquered, the Deccan was as far from being conquered as ever and remained up to the end of the reign and indeed to the end of the Moghul days of rule an endless sink of Moghul enterprise and Moghul valour.

Jai Singh in the meantime had been doing his best to subdue the Bijapur kingdom. He got as far as the capital which he beleaguered in due form. But here his success ended. The Bijapur Generals entered Moghul territory and began laying it waste. "Others were sent to oppose the Raja and attack his baggage. The embankments of the tanks were cut, poisonous matters and carrion were thrown into the wells, the trees and lofty buildings near the fortress were destroyed, spikes were fixed in the ground, and the gardens and houses on both sides of the city were so destroyed that not a trace of culture was left near the city. Khwaja Neknam, a eunuch, joined Sharza Khan, the commander of Adil Khan's army, with a reinforcement of 6,000 horse and 25,000 infantry, from Kutb-ul-Mulk. Every day there was severe fighting, and the men and animals which went out from the Imperial Army to forage were cut off.' '*

The effects of this laying waste of the country were that soon scarcity, approximating to famine, began to make itself felt in the Moghul camp. Jai Singh was forced to retreat. His colleague Dilir Khan was recalled; soon afterwards he himself was also summoned to Court but died on his way. Prince Muazzam, who had for the time being been relieved of the government of the Deccan, was again appointed Viceroy and Raja Jeswant Singh was made his chief assistant. The change was all in favour of Sivaji, who had by this time again begun to make himself felt. At first he professed that he was acting on behalf of the King of Golkonda, who had been unwise enough to aid him with guns and material, but very soon he showed that he was entirely playing for his own hand. Jeswant Singh was supposed, probably correctly, of more or less conniving at Sivaji's doings, in this being absolutely unlike Jai Singh, who during the whole of his Deccan career showed that he was in earnest in his undertakings on behalf of his Master.

Prince Muazzam entered into negotiations with Sivaji and obtained from the Government the title of Raja for him, and also the confirmation of a Mansab as well as the grant of a Jaghir in Berar for his son Sambhaji. The Mahratta historians suggest that all this was done with the intention of entrapping Sivaji, but if so, in vain was the net spread. Once bitten, Sivaji was too shy again to entrust himself into Moghul hands. Even the force of the Deccan Moghul army being in revolt, failed to induce him to join them. Aurangzeb had lost his chance forever on that eventful Durbar day at Delhi. Even up to this time it seems that the Emperor was more interested in laying traps to find out who of his army chiefs were unfaithful than in the catching of Sivaji. And of this the latter took full advantage. He fortified afresh his old chief fort Rajgarh and set to building on a more inaccessible hill—a still stronger fort. The old name of this hill was Rahiri. The fort on it is now known as Raigarh; near it passes the high road to Surat. Though at a considerable distance from the sea an inlet passed within a few miles of its base.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 277.

“After the guns were mounted, and the place made safe, he closed all the roads around, leaving only one leading to his fortress. One day he called an assembly, and having placed a bag of gold and a gold bracelet worth a hundred pagodas before the people, he ordered proclamation to be made that this would be given to any one who would ascend to the fort, and plant a flag, by any other than the appointed road, without the aid of ladder or rope. A Dher came forward, and said that, with the permission of the Raja, he would mount to the top of the hill, plant the flag, and return. He ascended the hill, fixed the flag, quickly came down again, and made his obeisance.”*

A purse and gold bracelet was given to the adventurous Dher and the path he had ascended was broken up so that no one in future might clamber up that way. After this Sivaji again in A. D. 1671 plundered Surat. The English and Dutch defended their factories manfully, and escaped without loss, but the town was plundered and the loot included the property of a prince from Mawar-un-Nahr on his way back from Mecca. Aurangzeb was again touched in his most vulnerable point. He was not slow to show his anger by removing Jeswant Sing and appointing Mahabat Khan in his place. This chief was, however, of little use and was soon recalled and with him went Prince Muazzam. The successor to the Deccan command was Khan Jahan Bahadur, formerly Governor of Gujarat, who became Viceroy of the Deccan in 1672 A. D. About the same time Sivaji nearly obtained possession of Jinjira. Fatteh Khan, its ruler, being hard pressed by the Mahratta and not being helped by the Bijapur authorities, had made up his mind to yield when a rebellion headed by three Sidis nipped the plan in the bud. The Sidis agreed to hold Jinjira as a Moghul possession and were granted titles as Imperial Nobles. About this time A. D. 1672 the King of Bijapur died, leaving as his successor in that troubled and distracted kingdom an only son, Sultan Sikander, who was at that time but five years of age. The natural consequences followed—rival noblemen striving for supremacy, intrigue and anarchy everywhere rampant. The end of the Kingdom was coming in sight.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 288.

While these events were going on in the Deccan, Aurangzeb's policy was fast developing itself in the north. In the early part of A. D. 1669 he directed the suppression of the Hindu theological schools at Benares and in April of that year the Temple of Bishnath was destroyed in that town. On the site where it stood was built a mosque known as the Mosque of Aurangzeb and so it has come about that the best site along the river frontage at Benares is covered, not with a Hindu pile, as would be in accord with the spirit of the Hindu holy city, but with a place of worship of a faith absolutely alien from Hinduism. In December of the same year was destroyed the great Hindu temple at Muttra. This had been erected, we are told, by the Bundela Raja who had murdered Abul Fazl, and who had, as a reward for this service, obtained from Jehangir on his accession permission to erect this building. The author of the Maasir-i-Alamgiri piously ejaculates: "Glory be to God, who has given us the faith of Islam, that, in this reign of the destroyer of false gods, an undertaking so difficult of accomplishment has been brought to a successful termination. This vigorous support given to the true faith was a severe blow to the arrogance of the Rajas, and, like idols, they turned their faces awe-struck to the wall."*

Hindus have in the past been long, very long, suffering; but though this is the case, still their tenacity is equal to their power of uncomplainingly bearing sufferings for what they consider the holiest, and the destroyer of temples at Muttra and Benares was destroying at the same time the very foundations of Mussalman rule.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 184.

The next step of Aurangzeb in his march towards Muhammedan ascendancy was the exemption of goods belonging to Mussalmans from customs or transit duties. This, however, was found to be impracticable; then schemes of differentiation were adopted by which goods belonging to Muhammedans were to pay only half the rates paid for goods owned by Hindus. This also naturally led to evasions and subterfuges and the only result was absolute confusion. About this time, i.e., the early seventies—caused partly at least by Aurangzeb's proselytising tendencies—there occurred a most extraordinary outbreak of a sect of Hindu devotees known as Satnamis. These people, though devotees, carried on trade and agriculture on a small scale and prided themselves alike on the correctness of their life and on their mutually assisting each other in trouble. From small beginnings their rebellion took formidable proportions. 'They captured the town of Narnal in the Punjab, and proceeded there to establish a Government of their own. Troops sent against them by Aurangzeb were defeated and dispersed.* "It was said that swords, arrows, and musket balls had no effect upon these men, and that every arrow and ball which they discharged against the royal army brought down two or three men. Thus they were credited with magic and witchcraft and stories were currently reported about them which were utterly incredible. They were said to have magic wooden horses like live ones, on which their women rode as an advanced guard." The rebels advanced close to Delhi. Aurangzeb's troops seem to have been fairly frightened by them. Aurangzeb, partly probably through superstitious motives and partly because he believed that it would inspire confidence in his troops, wrote prayers with his own hands which he directed to be sewn on to the banners of his army. At last the rebellion was stamped out. Much blood was shed and the Satnamis disappear from history. All this led up to the great event of Aurangzeb's reign, which finally and completely alienated all Hindus from him, the reimposition of the Jizya. This is a poll tax levied on non-Muhammedans. It was in the early days of Islam a cardinal feature of Muhammedan administration. Non-believers paid the Jizya; believers were exempt. On the other hand, the wars of Islam had to be carried on by the followers of the Prophet who were bound, if so called upon, to serve as soldiers. But times had changed since the days of Omar, and a tax perfectly justifiable in his days, became un-supportable at a time when Rajput soldiers formed a great part, and possibly the best part of the Moghul Army. All sections of the Hindu community joined in the uproar that followed. Sivaji, whose own methods of taxation hardly bear close investigation, was as loud in the outcry as any one. Khafi Khan writes as to the reception of it at Delhi thus :* “ Upon the publication of this order, the Hindus all round Delhi assembled in vast numbers under the jharokha of the Emperor on the river front of the palace, to represent their inability to pay, and to pray for the recall of the edict. But the Emperor would not listen to their complaints. One day, when he went to public prayer in the great mosque on the Sabbath, a vast multitude of Hindus thronged the road from the palace to the mosque, with the object of seeking relief. Money changers and drapers, all kinds of shop-keepers from the Urdu bazar, mechanics, and workmen of all kinds, left off work and business, and pressed into the way. Notwithstanding orders were given to force a way through, it was impossible for the Emperor to reach the mosque. Every moment the crowd increased, and the Emperor's equipage was brought to a standstill. At length an order was given to bring out the elephants and direct them against the mob. Many fell trodden to death under the feet of the elephants and horses. For some days the Hindus continued to assemble in great numbers and complain, but at length they submitted to pay the Jizya.” The trouble thus caused was intensified by the death of Raja Jeswant Singh, which happened shortly afterwards at Cabul of which place he was Viceroy. His death was supposed to have been brought about by poison administered at Aurangzeb's instigation. In any case it was the cause of much sorrow to the whole of the Hindu community.† “The Hindu race was in despair at the loss of the support of their faith. The bells of the temple were mute, the sacred shell no longer sounded at sunrise: the Brahmins vitiated their doctrines and learned the Moslem creed."

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 295.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 296.

† Tod, Vol. II, p. 50.

The exact date of the Edict imposing the Jizya is not very clear but it was before Sivaji's death, which happened in the year 1680 A. D. Probably it was in the year 1679 A. D. though it may have been a year earlier. In any case in order to keep to anything like chronological order it is necessary to return to Sivaji and his turbulent Mahrattas. We left him trying in vain to seize Jinjira. About this time he came in contact with a more formidable foe than the Sidis in the person of the Governor of Bombay, which by this time had passed, as the wedding portion of Catherine of Braganza on her marriage with Charles the II, from Portuguese into English hands. In the plunder of Hubli, a commercial town of considerable importance in the Bijapur State by the Mahrattas, the English Factory had shared the common fate. Mr. Gerald Aungier, the real founder of Bombay, was then Governor there and in spite of Sivaji's denials insisted on reparation. The Mahratta had already for various reasons learned to respect English prowess, and so after much evasions and delay, concluded a treaty with the English Governor whereby indemnification was to be given for past losses, the import tax on English goods was fixed at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. ad valorem, each power's coin was to pass freely in the territories of both, and wrecks were to be restored. Shortly before this treaty Sivaji was solemnly enthroned as Raja at Rajgarh, and henceforward the Mahrattas claimed that theirs, equally with the Delhi power, was a Kingdom. The ceremony of enthronement was witnessed by Mr. Oxenden, the British Envoy. The rites were tedious and long: what seemed to have impressed Mr. Oxenden most was Sivaji's being weighed against gold which was afterwards distributed amongst Brahmins. What probably pleased the new King most, was his being recognised as belonging to a high sub-class of the Rajputs. The Hindus of the two holy rivers the Indus and the Ganges and those of the Rajput desert think themselves commonly the only real Hindus of noble caste in existence and look down on those that come from South of the Vindhya. Wealth has its way in India, however, as elsewhere, and a judicious use of it enabled Sivaji, as it has enabled Hindus in other parts, to rise with the Brahmin's blessing in the scale of Hindu society. On his coronation the usual grand titles were given to his chief officers, and as the outward sign of the revolution in Indian affairs that was coming about, the new titles were all Sanscrit and not Persian.

The last six years of Sivaji's life as related by the Historians is one confused melée of fights and stratagems. Every day the Moghul power was pressing Bijapur and every day that power was getting nearer its doom. Sivaji was generally at war with Bijapur and always at war with the Moghuls. Occasionally he allied himself with the former power, but such an alliance did it no good. The one strong point of the Bijapur Kingdom in its last days was the strength of its capital. No besieging power could take the city by storm, unless aided by treachery within, and though there was always a Moghul faction in the capital, it was not sufficiently powerful nor sufficiently Moghul to absolutely betray its country. Otherwise the State was in absolute confusion. Golkonda was in a better way, but even there faction raged strong and it was only a matter of time, when the last assault should come. Sivaji allied himself to this latter power, promising much, and was thereby enabled to proceed in safety to the Carnatic to which place he proceeded with a great army to take possession of his father Shahji's lands, which were mostly held by his half brother Venkaji. In this he succeeded on the whole, though he did not settle his disputes with this brother of his. In this expedition the Hindu ascetic side of his character stood out prominently in the penances he performed at the sacred shrine of Parwattam.

“At last,” we are told, “he was worked up into such a state of enthusiasm as to draw his sword for the purpose of sacrificing himself to the Deity, when it is pretended he was saved by the direct interposition of the Goddess Bhowanee, by whose inspiration Sivaji on this occasion, uttered one of his many prophecies: and whilst the Deity, through him, declared the necessity of his yet remaining to perform many great services for the Hindu faith, she announced the splendid conquests that were to be immediately achieved in the Carnatic."* On his return he heard that Venkaji had attacked the troops he had left behind, whereupon he addressed a long letter to him,† "in which he recapitulated everything that had occurred, represented the extreme indiscretion of a conduct, which had compelled him to take possession of the districts : and now, had obliged his officers to repel aggression by force of arms, that the slaughter of the vile Muhammedans, who had joined in the attack, was not to be regretted : but he ought to reflect on the sacrifice of valuable lives which it had occasioned. Sivaji, in his letter dwells much on the necessity of union, and the propriety of peace : which last he now proposes to grant, on receiving the whole of their father's territorial possessions in the Carnatic, for which he promises, either to allow his brother an equivalent in the Panala districts, or to obtain a grant of territory from his ally Kootub Shah in some other part of the country, equal to three lakhs of pagodas annually." The two brothers shortly afterwards came to an agreement, whereby Ginjee and the districts around remained with Venkaji : as did a part of his father's wealth. The rest came into Sivaji's hands and was the foundation of the Mahratta power in Southern India. His position was confirmed by the Bijapur Government as the price of his alliance. Venkaji again kicked and threatened to turn devotee. Sivaji's advice to him was given in a letter which has been preserved. It runs thus : ‡ " Many days have elapsed without my receiving any letter from you : and in consequence, I am not in comfort. Ragoo Punt has now written, that you, having placed melancholy and gloom before yourself, do not take care of your person, or in any way attend to yourself as formerly : nor do you keep up any great days or religious festivals. Your troops are inactive, and you have no mind to employ yourself on State affairs. You have become a Byragee, and think of nothing but to sit in some place accounted holy, and let time wear away. In this manner, * Duff's Mahrattas, Vol. I, p. 273.

---

† Do., pp. 284-85.

‡ Duff's Mahrattas, Vol. I, pp. 294-95.

much has been written to me, and such an account of you has given me great concern. I am surprised when I reflect, that you have our father's example before you, how did he encounter and surmount all difficulties, perform great actions, escape all dangers by his spirit and resolution, and acquire a renown which he maintained to the last? All he did, is well known to you. You enjoyed his society, you had every opportunity of profiting by his wisdom and ability. Even I myself, as circumstances enabled me, have protected myself; and you also know, and have seen, how I have established a kingdom. Is it then for you, in the very midst of opportunity, to renounce all worldly affairs, and turn Byragee—to give up your affairs to persons who will devour your estate—to ruin your property, and injure your bodily health? What kind of wisdom is this, and what will it end in? I am to you as your head and protection: from me you have nothing to dread. Give up therefore all this, and do not become a Byragee. Throw off despondency, spend your days properly: attend to fasts, feasts, and customary usages, and attend to your personal comforts. Look to the employment of your people, the discipline of your army, and turn your attention to affairs of moment. Make your men do their duty: apply their services properly in your quarter, and gain fame and renown. What a comfort and happiness it will be to me to hear the praise and fame of my younger brother. Raghunath Pundit is near you, he is no stranger to you, consult him on what is most advisable to be done and he will consider you in the same light as myself. I have placed every confidence in him—do you the same: hold together for your mutual support, and you will acquire celebrity and fame. Above all things be not slothful: do not allow opportunity to slip past without receiving some returns from your army. This is the time for performing great actions. Old age is the season for turning Byragee. Arouse! bestir yourself. Let me see what you can do. Why should I write more, you are wise." No one will gainsay the wisdom of this Sivaji's farewell advice. Shortly after writing it, the Mahratta national hero was dead. The nation, which he made self-conscious, exists as such to this day. The question naturally arises how has this change in its being come about. The story of Sivaji's life seems but one of raids and plunder, of sudden inroads and rapid flights, mixed with occasional feats of the most dare-devil bravery and alas at times with the grossest treachery. But if he had only been a successful marauder, he could hardly have left the mark on the time that he did. The greatest marauder perhaps in the whole world's history, Atilla the Hun, passed away and save in the way of ruins and devastation left hardly a trace behind. Chenghiz Khan, of whom I have written in the first volume, was much more than a mere robber chief. And so was Sivaji. To judge the man right one must turn first to the methods of governing and conquering which he practised. The time was indeed much in his favour, but the time without the man can do but little. It is necessary then in order to judge him aright to understand the system of rule he introduced. The foundation of this was the organisation of plunder abroad and of severe and just government at home. His soldiers—the best of whom the Mawali infantry were hillmen, trained to a hard and abstemious life—were bound to account for all the plunder they might obtain. Every article carried off by them was supposed to be inventoried and Sivaji's intelligence department was so complete that it was comparatively rare that plunder escaped notice. His soldiers had always the right of purchasing any article they might have carried off, but if they attempted to keep anything secretly for themselves they were severely punished. No women were allowed in his camps. Thus a Mahratta army was in striking contrast to a Moghul host; in the latter women, luxury, grandeur abandoned: in the former abstinence, abstemiousness was the universal rule. It was but little wonder that the heavy weighted Moghul found the light Mahratta an elusive and yet an undefeatable foe. As regards the internal government of the lands under his rule, Sivaji's first care was his soldiers. Lands were given to them near the forts where they were quartered for the support of their wives and families. He put his face sternly against the curse of India, the tunkah (as it is called) directing a village to pay certain sums of moneys to an official for his own salary or for any other purpose. Such a system is susceptible of the gravest abuses and Sivaji steadily set his face against it.* Payments were made in cash or by an order on one of the Revenue Collectors. As far as the revenue came from the land it was derived from a share of the produce—ordinarily two-fifths. The peasant knew what he had to pay and he seems to have been able to pay this without any great oppression. Besides the revenue he derived from his own States, and the plunder which his soldiers brought from abroad, he claimed first of all from certain limited districts in Bijapur, then from some of the Moghul territories, and finally from any non-Mahratta land where his claim had any likelihood of success, certain assignments of revenue known as Chouth (one-fourth) and Sirdeshmookhi (one-tenth). He first obtained a grant of Chouth from Aurangzeb as Viceroy in the Deccan previous to his memorable journey to Delhi. The order was on Bijapur and the Moghul Prince who gave it but little thought what a terrible weapon he was putting into Sivaji's hand. The demand for these assignments could be made a convenient excuse for making war and plundering whenever the claimant of the Chouth chose. For the right to this entailed the right to examine and verify the accounts of the power from whom it was demanded, and as such a right would only be conceded by a power at death's door, there was an unfailing cause of dispute always ready for the Mahratta. Add to this that the question as to what districts had to pay Chouth was always in dispute, and it can be seen to what trouble this claim was sure to lead.

The Muhammedan historian of the reign, though naturally inclined to paint the Mahratta chief in unfavourable colours, comments thus on his character. "Sivaji had always striven to maintain the honour of the people in his territories. He persevered in a course of rebellion, in plundering caravans, and troubling mankind: but he entirely abstained from other disgraceful acts, and was careful to maintain the honour of the women and children of Muhammedans when they fell into his hands. His injunctions upon this point were very strict, and anybody who disobeyed them received punishment."† This coming from the source it does is really high praise. Hindu authors, particularly Mahrattas, are naturally enthusiastic. His faults were mainly those of the time: his virtues were his own. As the originator of a system which sapped away the strength of the Moghul power, his name must ever stand high amongst the great personalities of the East. At the same time with wiser counsels at Agra and Delhi he would have accomplished but little. If he had lived in Akbar's time, his talents would have been probably utilised by that great King as a warrior and as an administrator, and instead of being the scourge of the Empire he would have been one of its numerous pillars. But to guess what might have been is ever a futile occupation. What was, is the task of history and Sivaji may well be described as the first of the destroyers of the Moghul power. His son Sambhaji succeeded to his kingdom: he turned out to be a profligate without anything to recommend him save a certain amount of reckless bravery, and the Moghul power in the Deccan had consequently a breathing time of which, however, it did not make any use to retrieve its last strength. Of this, more hereafter. We must now turn again to Northern India.

* Later Mahratta rulers abandoned this rule.

† Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 305.

“When Jeswant died beyond the Attock, his wife, the (future) mother of Ajit, determined to burn with her lord, but being in the seventh month of her pregnancy, she was forcibly prevented by Ooda Koompawaut. His other queen and seven patras (concubines) mounted the pyre: and as soon as the tidings reached Jodhpore, the Chundravati queen, taking a turban of her late lord, ascended the pile at Mundore.”* After the Rani's delivery of a boy, who was named Ajit Sing, she and the Rajputs who had been the late Raja's body-guard set out from Cabul homeward. They were opposed at the Attock Fort by the guard there, who stated that they had received orders not to let them pass, but brushing away this obstacle, the Rajput troop reached Delhi. Here guards were put over them, and, according to Rajput story, the infant Ajit Sing, the heir to his father's possessions, was smuggled out of Delhi in a sweetmeat seller's basket: this perilous task being effected by a faithful Muhammedan. Blood flowed in torrents in a fight between the Rajputs and the Moghuls in the Delhi streets, but the baby Ajit Sing found a safe retreat in one of the innermost and most inaccessible recesses of the Aravali hills. Aurangzeb steadily refused to acknowledge Ajit Sing as the legitimate child of Jeswant Singh and affected to consider him as spurious. But Rajputs, at least, gave up all suspicion on this score when a number of years later the Rana of Udaipur married him to his daughter. This the Rana would certainly not have done if he had the slightest suspicion as to the child's paternity or legitimacy. Aurangzeb, baffled in this matter, for he had hoped to hold the infant in his custody as a hostage for the fidelity of the Rajputs, now came to the conclusion that the time had arrived for the final subjugation of the Rajput race. From all quarters of his Empire troops were collected together to crush this obstinate and stiff-necked people. Raj Sing was then the Rana of Mewar, which, as ever, was the centre of the Rajput opposition. The campaign started in its usual fashion. After some unequal fighting in which various bands of Rajputs devoted themselves to death, the plain part of Rajputana was overcome. There Aurangzeb remained, but a large part of his army under his son Prince Akbar and Tuhawar Khan entered through the hills into the valley—the circle as it is called—in which the capital of Mewar stands. "Not a soul interrupted his (Akbar's) progress to the city. Palaces, gardens, lakes and isles, met his eye, but no living thing: all was silence. Akbar encamped. Accustomed to this desertion; from the desire of the people to avoid a licentious soldiery, and lulled into a hardy security, he was surprised by the heir of Mewar. Some were praying, some feasting, some at chess: they came to steal and yet fell asleep, says the annalist, and were dispersed with terrific and unrelenting slaughter."* Retreat was cut off, annihilation seemed the only prospect when the Rana's eldest son Jai Singh, trusting to the promises of the Moghul chiefs to bring about an end to the war, permitted the discomfited soldiers to proceed through the dangerous defiles into a place of safety. At the same time another Moghul Army under Dilir Khan, which had entered the passes with the hope of extricating Akbar, was totally routed. Inspired by these victories, the Rajputs proceeded to attack Aurangzeb himself, and after a hard fought encounter at Dohari forced him to retreat with the loss of the Imperial standard, numerous elephants and much of the Royal carriage.

* Tod, Vol. II, p. 50.

* Tod, Vol. I, p. 325.

At the same time Gujarat and Malwa were harried through and through by Rajput bands. The Kazis were bound and shaved, says the annalist, the Korans thrown into wells. Aurangzeb was forced to call up the army of the Deccan with Prince Muazzam at its head. This army also marched into the hill country but fared but little better than the other Imperial armies had fared before. The Rajputs now thought it time to make a strike for Empire. Not that they thought of placing a Hindu on the throne of Delhi—such thoughts had come into their minds after the first battle of Panipat when Baber was still a stranger in the country and the Afghan rule seemed for ever at an end, but now all that they wished was a tolerant Muhammedan ruler, one who should hold the Rajputs as his most faithful and loyal servants. Their thoughts seemed first to have turned to Prince Muazzam, but his loyalty to his father was not to be seduced. Aurangzeb did indeed suspect him, so much so indeed that at one time he directed his guns to be trained on his son's camp, but finding that, on his inviting Muazzam to visit him alone, the son obeyed at once, his suspicions ceased. It was otherwise with Prince Akbar. The same desire for sovereignty that had animated Aurangzeb twenty-five years ago to snatch the throne from his father now tempted Akbar to desert the Imperial army and put himself at the head of the Rajputs. Tahawur Khan with a small escort entered the Imperial camp with the ostensible object of putting forward Prince Akbar's demands. Whether this was his real object or whether he had made up his mind to assassinate, if possible, Aurangzeb, one cannot say. Anyhow he attempted to enter the royal presence, armed. Khafi Khan tells the story of his end thus :

“The Khan demurred to putting off his arms, so Prince Muhammad Muazzam made a sign to kill the unhappy man. It was now stated to the Emperor that Tahawur Khan had come under the orders of Prince Muhammad Akbar, to make known his pretensions and demands. On hearing this, Aurangzeb's anger blazed forth and he placed his hand upon his sword, and ordered that the Khan should be allowed to enter with his arms. But one of the attendants in an insulting way, placed his hand upon the Khan's breast to stop him. The Khan struck him a blow on the face and retreated, but his foot caught in a rope, and he fell down. Cries of 'strike! slay!' arose on all sides. Numbers fell upon him, and he was soon killed, and his head was cut off. After he was dead, it was found that he had armour under his clothes, but there were various opinions as to what his real intentions were."*

Prince Akbar was not fated to be as successful as his father had been before him. From all we know of him, it would seem that he had neither his father's craft nor his cleverness. Aurangzeb played successfully the old trick. A letter was written in which Prince Akbar was recommended for having befooled the Rajputs so successfully by his pretended rebellion and giving instructions as to how and when he should fall on and attack his friends. This letter fell, as it was meant to fall, into Rajput hands. From this moment all confidence was gone; the Rajput host, which had followed Akbar, melted away. Without a battle, the greatest danger to which Aurangzeb had been exposed since that fateful day before Agra, when Dara Shikoh descended too soon from his elephant and thereby changed the history of the East, passed away. Prince Akbar found himself left almost alone with Durga Das the lord of Drunara, who true to the fealty he had sworn, preserved Prince Akbar from all the dangers to which he was exposed and safely conveyed him to the camp of Sambhaji in Mahratta. The haughty Moghul Prince and the savage Mahratta chieftain had absolutely nothing in common, and after a short stay with the Mahratta, Prince Akbar left him and embarked in an English ship for Muscat.

From there he proceeded to Persia where he lived for many years, dying only shortly before his father. The war between Rajput and Moghul lingered for some time, but without any positive result. Aurangzeb did not feel inclined again to attempt what no Sovereign of India had ever accomplished before him, a complete conquest of Rajput country. A treaty was made in which the Moghul restored Chitor and the lands around it which his armies had occupied; and it was laid down that the practice of turning Hindu temples into Muhammedan mosques should be discontinued, but that what had been could not be altered, the past, as the treaty says, not being able to be recalled. As regards the Jiziya the treaty is silent, but as a matter of fact its collection in Rajputana ceased. Once and again there was war after this in parts of Rajputana during Aurangzeb's reign, but it was never on a great scale.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 303-4.

From now for the rest of his reign, Aurangzeb's thoughts were ever turned to the Deccan, and the history of the last twenty-five years of his rule is almost exclusively concerned with lands South of the Vindhya.

At this time, 1681 A. D., the two Kingdoms of Bijapur and Golkonda, the only remains of the old Bahmini state, were still in existence, though in the last stage of decay. On the other hand, though Sivaji was dead and though Sambhaji had no statesmanlike qualities, the Mahrattas suffered but little from the want of unity or of centralised leading. Sivaji had taught them their strength and the strength of their country. Time and the feebleness of their opponents were to do the rest. The Emperor seems to have been induced to proceed south largely by the fact that his son Akbar was there, for though we have told how eventually the latter left India, still this was not till A. D. 1682, considerably later than the conclusion of the great Rajput war. Aurangzeb's chief officer in the Deccan, Khan Jahan, was both a feeble and corrupt officer. Sambhaji had celebrated his accession in real Mahratta fashion by a sudden inroad into Moghul territory, aiming at the provincial capital, Burhanpur. This he did not manage to capture, but he plundered its suburbs and got away safe with an enormous amount of loot. Khan Jahan marched from Aurangabad in order to cut off his retreat, but he moved leisurely, and when he did get an opportunity of coming to close quarters, deliberately refused it. No wonder that Aurangzeb waxed wrath and deprived him of his honours. A Moghul Emperor had become in these days, the days of Akbar having long gone by, too wedded to Oriental ceremony, ever to move in a hurry, and though Aurangzeb was very abstemious and simple in his personal habits, still as regards appearing in public in royal state he was as particular as his father. And so it was that the year A. D. 1682 had commenced before he reached Burhanpur. From this time onward the rest of his life practically was spent camping. The Moghul camp indeed resembled a considerable town. The tents of the Emperor, of his seraglio, of his chief nobles and their seraglios, and of the countless hangers on of the Court took up as much room as a fair sized town, but it was a town, never certain as to when it was to move, and hence on a bigger and grander scale it was the old life of the steppes again. When Aurangzeb reached Burhanpur, Prince Akbar was still with Sambhaji, but fear on his score had almost entirely gone. More troublesome were the Jiziya troubles. Officers in the Deccan had been slack, if they had tried at all, to collect the same. But with the Emperor's coming, this was all changed. The Jiziya had to be enforced happen what might. And so even in the towns there were disturbances.

As regards the external foe the first incursion by the Emperor's troops into Mahratta land was unfortunate. The strong fort of Salir in the Konkan near the sea was its objective. The Muhammedan historian tells us how the staple grains of the country were poor diet for the invading force, how the horses and camels died so that Prince Azam, the head of the expedition himself had to walk, how life at last became insupportable and how the troops had to retreat. Force after force went against this fortress in vain, but what force could not effect negotiation did. By the end of the year Salir had surrendered. The story of the siege of this fort was repeated in the siege of the Ramdarra forts. Here again there was not much difficulty until the forts were reached. Then troubles began. "The air of the place did not suit the invaders. The enemy swarmed around on every side, and cut the supplies. On one side was the sea, and on the other two sides were mountains full of poisonous trees and serpents. The enemy cut down the grass, which was a cause of great distress to man and beast, and they had no food but cocoanuts, and the grain called kudun, which acted like poison upon them. Great numbers of men and horses died. Grain was so scarce and dear that wheat flour sometimes could not be obtained for less than three or four rupees. Those men who escaped death dragged on a half existence, and with crying and groaning felt as if every breath they drew was their last. There was not a noble who had a horse in his stable fit for use. When the wretched state of the royal army became known to Aurangzeb, he sent an order to the officers of the port of Surat, directing them to put as much grain as possible on board of ships, and send it to the Prince's succour by sea. The enemy got intelligence of this, and as the ships had to pass by their newly erected fortresses they stopped them on their way, and took most of them. A few ships escaped the enemy, and reached their destination; but no amir got more than two or three palas of corn. The order at length came for the retreat of the army, and it fell back fighting all the way to Ahmednuggur, where Aurangzeb then was.'*'

The story of these marches and sieges has now become monotonous. Still the Moghul armies, containing as they did numerous Turks, Afghans and Rajputs were the best fighting force in India when it was the question of a pitched battle. But organised as they were, campaigns in anything like a difficult country could not be successfully carried on. They ever sighed for the ease of their great standing camps, and their leaders had no inclination for the slow persevering work, which campaigning in such countries demanded. Sambhaji in the meantime was engaged in fighting the English and Portuguese. At one time it seemed quite probable that he might obtain possession either by force or by treaty of Bombay. But his rage eventually turned against the Portuguese. At first these latter obtained some advantages and invaded his country, but not venturing to advance, made a most disastrous retreat, losing all their guns, stores and camp equipment and the victorious Sambhaji was only stopped by the waters that separate the island of Goa from the main land. The war went on for years, the Mahrattas having on the whole considerably the better of it, storming and plundering such Portuguese centres at Bassein and Daman: but still being not strong enough to eject the Portuguese from their strongholds.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 314.

At last Aurangzeb was ready for the final advance against Bijapur and Golkonda. He always had grounds of complaint against the Government of both States on account of their helping the Mahrattas or on account of the hundred and one reasons which a strong State can bring forward concerning frontier troubles against a weaker. Aurangzeb, who was nothing if not orthodox, always alleged religious reasons for his wars. The prevailing religion amongst both the Bijapur and Golkonda nobles was the Shiah form of Muhammedanism. And to a rigid Sunni a Shiah is considered but little better than an infidel. Add to this that the sovereign of Golkonda had as his two chief ministers, two Hindus Madana and Akana, and Aurangzeb found complete justification for the wars he was starting against the two remaining Muhammedan Deccan states. Before attacking the King of Golkonda, a message was sent to him demanding the balance of tribute (there was always a balance of tribute in those days), and that two very fine diamonds should be sent in lieu of money. The historian naively says: "Aurangzeb told his envoy confidentially that he did not send him to obtain the two diamonds, which he did not at all want, but rather to ascertain the truth of the evil reports which had reached him."* These evil reports related to the kingdom being ruled by Hindus and the King having given himself over to debauchery. The reply was—and it was probably true—that there were no such diamonds. Thereupon a Moghul army advanced into Golkonda territory, having as its heads, for Aurangzeb always added a General of his own if a Prince of the blood, however able, commanded his troops, Prince Muazzam and Khan Jahan. The advance was only partially successful. Khafi Khan claims indeed that the Imperial troops gained a victory over an enemy superior in numbers, but however this might be, the armies did not advance and to the vaunting despatch of the leaders, announcing a great victory, Aurangzeb sent an angry reply. The leaders on the other hand got offended and remained inactive for several months. On the Emperor's insisting on action Khan Jahan and Prince Muazzam sent a messenger into the Golkonda camp offering peace if certain Parganahs on the Eastern Coast were surrendered. The answer given was "That they had taken the Parganahs at the point of the sword and spear, and were ready to fight for them."* Fighting was resumed and the Golkonda troops were driven back towards Golkonda. And then happened what so often has happened in Oriental history. The King's mind was poisoned against his Commander-in-Chief Muhammad Ibrahim. He tried to seize him, but fruitlessly. Off went Muhammad Ibrahim to the Imperialists. On this being known the King incontinently fled into the Golkonda fort. The consequence was what might have been expected. "When this fact became public, the stores of Abul Hussan were plundered, as also was the property of the merchants, worth four or five krons of rupees. The women of the soldiers, and of the inhabitants of the city, were subjected to dishonour, and great disorder and destruction prevailed. Many thousand gentlemen being unable to take horse, and carry off their property, in the greatest distress took the hands of their children and wives, many of whom could not even seize a veil or sheet to cover them, and fled into the fortress. Before Prince Shah Alam got intelligence of what was passing, the ruffians and plunderers of the city began their work of pillage and devastation. Nobles, merchants and poorer men, vied with each other as to who, by strength of arms, and by expenditure of money, should get their families and property into the fortress. Before break of day, the Imperial forces attacked the city, and a frightful scene of plunder and destruction followed, for in every part and road and market there were lacs upon lacs of money, stuffs, carpets, horses and elephants, belonging to Abul Hussan and his nobles. Words cannot express how many women and children of Mussulmans and Hindus were made prisoners, or how many women of high and low degree were dishonoured. Carpets of great value, which were too heavy to carry, were cut to pieces with swords and daggers, and every bit was struggled for. Prince Shah Alam appointed officers (sazawals) to prevent the plunder, and they did their best to restrain it, but in vain."* The craven King sent a messenger begging humbly for peace A. D. 1686. This was granted but under the most humiliating conditions. The Parganahs before demanded were to be surrendered, a crushing war indemnity was to be paid and the Hindu ministers were to be imprisoned. Above all the King was personally to beg for pardon from Aurangzeb. As regards that one of the terms which referred to the Hindu ministers, this turned out to be unnecessary. Even before the negotiations were closed, they were barbarously murdered, probably at the instigation of certain women of the harem who hoped thereby to curry favour with the conquering Moghuls.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 315.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 389.

Their heads were cut off and sent to Prince Shah Alam. Before the invasion of Golkonda, Imperial troops under the same Generals had invaded the Kingdom of Bijapur. The rulers of that State had followed their usual tactics. They had allowed the Imperial army to reach the capital without much resistance, but when the army got there, it found itself incapable of capturing the town and was forced after suffering much want to retire. To add to the troubles of the time, the Mahrattas had taken the opportunity it afforded to them, by the absence of a large part of the Moghul troops further south, to sack both Broach and Burhanpur. In A. D. 1686 Sultan Azam again advanced. When he was near the capital, Bijapur troops got between him and his base. This reduced him to great distress and it was with great difficulty he was relieved. Ghazi-uddin Khan, who was to figure so greatly in the future history of the Deccan under the name of Nizam-ul-Mulk, comes into notice in this relief for the first time. Aurangzeb is said to have thanked him more for his services then done than he had ever thanked any other officer. The troops being reinforced again advanced and were joined on this occasion by a part of the army which had returned from the Golkonda war. Finally Aurangzeb joined it himself. The garrison stood out manfully but the inevitable end at last came.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 320.

The young ruler was put in strict confinement in which he died three years later, not without a suspicion of having been poisoned by the Emperor.

“Bijapur,” so the historian of the Mahrattas tells us, “henceforth ceased to be the capital, and was soon after deserted. The walls, which are of hewn stone and very lofty, are, to this day, entire, and being surmounted by the cupolas and minarets of the public buildings, still present to a spectator from without, the appearance of a flourishing city; but within,—all is solitude, silence, and desolation. The deep moat, the double rampart, and the ruins of splendid palaces in the citadel, attest the former magnificence of the Court. The great mosque is a grand edifice, and the tomb of Ibrahim Adil Shah, already mentioned, is remarkable for its elegant and graceful architecture, but the chief feature in the scene is the Mausoleum of Muhammed Adil Shah, the dome of which fills the eye from every point of view, and though in itself entirely devoid of ornaments, its enormous dimensions and austere simplicity invests it with an air of melancholy grandeur, which harmonizes with the wreck and desolation that surround it. In the climate where Bijapur is situated, the progress of decay is extremely rapid, and until lately nothing whatever was done to arrest its effects; but when viewed as mere ruins, the remains of that city, as they at present exist, are exceedingly grand, and, as a vast whole, far exceed anything of the kind in Europe.”* Since this was written it has more and more decayed, though Lord Curzon’s archæological zeal has been instrumental in restoring in part the ancient buildings—the only remaining evidence of its past glories.

After Bijapur came the turn of Golkonda. Aurangzeb had only approved of the late treaty in order that he might complete his work at Bijapur, and now demand after demand was pressed on the unfortunate Abul Hussan. Khafi Khan gives one of the Emperor’s letters to this Prince, a most characteristic production.

“The evil deeds of this wicked man pass beyond the bounds of writing; but by mentioning one out of a hundred, and a little out of much, some conception of them may be formed. First, placing the reins of authority and government in the hands of vile tyrannical infidels; oppressing and afflicting the Saiyids, Shaikhs, and other holy men; openly giving himself up to excessive debauchery and depravity; indulging in drunkenness and wickedness night and day; making no distinction between infidelity and Islam, tyranny and justice, depravity and devotion; waging obstinate war in defence of infidels; want of obedience to the divine commands and prohibitions, especially to that command which forbids assistance to an enemy's country, the disregarding of which had cast a censure upon the Holy Book in the sight both of God and man. Letters full of friendly advice and warning upon these points had been repeatedly written, and had been sent by the hands of discreet men. No attention had been paid to them; moreover, it had lately become known that a lac of pagodas had been sent to the wicked Sambha. That in this insolence and intoxication and worthlessness, no regard had been paid to the infamy of his deeds and no hope shown of deliverance in this world or the next." When the King saw that war was meant, he prepared for the worst and set his capital in as complete a state of defence as he could. The siege lasted for a month. During it Prince Muazzam fell under the suspicions of Aurangzeb who on his appearing in obedience to his orders alone in his presence, ordered him and his effects to be seized.

---

* Duff, Vol. I, p. 340.

The reason, which seems to have been the cause of this harsh treatment was, that he had tried to obtain favourable terms from the Emperor for Abul Hussan. Anyhow he was kept in confinement for six years after which he was sent to Cabul, as Viceroy, where he stayed away from his father for the rest of the reign. Aurangzeb himself was present during the whole siege. "Both besiegers and besieged severely suffered from hunger. The scarcity and dearness of grain and fodder (within the city) was extreme, so that many men of wealth were disheartened; who then can describe the position of the poor and needy? Throughout the Dakhin in the early part of this year there was a scarcity of rain when the jowar and bajra came into ear, so they dried up and perished. These productions of the autumn harvest are the main support of the people of the Dakhin. Rice is the principal food of the people of Haiderabad, and the cultivation of this has been stopped by war and by scarcity of rain. The Dakhinis and the forces of the Hell-dog Sambha had come to the assistance of Haiderabad, and hovering round the Imperial forces, they cut off the supplies of grain. Pestilence (waba) broke out and carried off many men. Thus great numbers of men were lost.’’*

An attempt at escalade failed owing to the barking of a dog. This animal is said to have been compensated by the King's giving him a gold collar and a plated chain. Attempts to carry the town by mining equally failed. On one occasion one of the mines exploded doing more injury to the besiegers than the besieged. On another it was found that the besieged had cleared out the powder and cut the match. But what force could not effect, treachery did. One by one the Golkonda nobles left their King and joined the Imperial troops. One chieftain alone is mentioned, Abdur Razaq Lari, who stuck honourably to the falling cause. At last all was over.

The gates were opened ; Abdur Razaq was desperately wounded in a fight in which he was almost solitary, and the King, assuming the dignity which so often distinguishes a high bred Oriental in adversity, accepting the inevitable, surrendered in a most dignified manner to the King's second son Prince Azam. The dethroned ruler was sent to Daulatabad as a prisoner. The Kutb Shahi dynasty was at an end. The Golkonda State under a new name with a new capital Haiderabad, close by the old, has come again to life in Indian history under a new dynasty, but the old Deccan sovereignties had now come to an end for ever. Each new Muhammedan power arising in future in the south was founded by adventurers from the north and not by scions of the old Bahmini dynasty. Abdur Razaq, the Bayard of the campaign, recovered from his wounds. Aurangzeb wished him to enter his service ; he on the other hand preferred to go to Mecca. He was not however permitted to go at once, but forced to enter for a time the Moghul service. At last he was permitted, though grudgingly to make the sacred journey. History tells us nothing further of him.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 328.

The great Kingdoms had gone ; but, especially in the Golkonda State, a hundred minor principalities remained.

These had to be subdued by degrees, and though most of them gave nominal obedience to the Moghul rulers, still such obedience was often nothing but nominal. The south of India never became a province of the Delhi power in the same way as Oudh or the Punjab, not even indeed in the same way as Bengal or Berar. And besides these numerous petty powers, there still remained the Mahrattas. Aurangzeb had considered them as mountain rats, whose power would come to an end whenever he chose, or if not, in any case as soon as he subdued the Muhammedan powers, particularly Bijapur which he considered behind them. Never was a ruler more mistaken.

These mountain rats were destined to reduce the Empire of the lordly Moghuls to a state of absolute anarchy and ruin, and it was only by the entry into India of newer and more virile races that the whole of India did not become Mahratta-ised. The Afghans under Ahmad Shah Abdali in the first instance prevented this and then the fair-skinned English from the West. But at the time of which we write in the eighties of the seventeenth century neither Mahratta nor Moghul had the slightest dream of the future. The former was quite content with independence and occasional loot, the latter thought that his domination was secure and that however troublesome the subjugation of the Mahratta might be, it was but a matter of time. A vivid picture of the actual state of the country south of the Vindhya at this time is to be found in Grant Duff's History of the Mahrattas. The Mankurees (Mahratta leaders); whilst their envoys were in the Imperial camp professing "perpetual obedience to Aurangzeb, the king of the world,"* frequently sent their parties to plunder the Moghul districts ; and in case of discovery, the Brahmin wukeel, who had secured the patronage of some great man at Court by bribery, was ready to answer for or excuse the irregular conduct of his master's followers. The * Duff, Vol. 1, p. 354.

---

Moghul Foujdars were instructed to conciliate the Mahratta chiefs on condition of their agreeing to serve with fidelity. The chiefs were negotiating with the Foujdar; their wukeels were intriguing at Court; their own villages were secure; and their followers, under the general name of Mahrattas, were ravaging some other part of the country. The Moghul officers who had Jaghir assignments in the Deccan, soon found that they could raise very little revenue; their corruption was increased by poverty, and the offenders who had, in the first instance, plundered their districts by purchasing the connivance of the Foujdars, bribed the Jaghirdars at Court with a part of the pillage. The hereditary rights, and the family feuds which had been before usually applied as an instrument of Government, now became, in the general confusion of this period, a great cause of increasing disorder. The intricate nature of some of the hereditary claims in dispute, and the ingenuity of the Brahmins, who were always the managers, made every case so plausible that the officers of Government found little difficulty in excusing, or at least palliating many acts of gross injustice, to which they scandalously lent themselves. Thus, the rightful owners had often good reason for complaint; they absented themselves with their troops, joined the plunderers, and when induced or compelled to come in, they boldly justified their behaviour by the injustice they had suffered.

When an hereditary office was forfeited, or became vacant in any way, the Moghul Government selected a candidate on whom it was conferred; but the established premium of the exchequer was upwards of six and a half years' purchase, or precisely 651 per cent. on one year's emoluments, one-fourth of which was made payable at the time of delivering the deeds, and the remainder by instalments; but besides this tax, an infinite number of fees and perquisites were exacted by the clerks, all which lent encouragement to confiscations and new appointments. The Emperor increasing in years was soon overwhelmed in more important cases than the mere details of business; his ministers and their underlings were alike negligent and corrupt, and even after deeds and papers were prepared, years elapsed before the orders they contained were put into execution."

Such a state of affairs could only have one result, and a large part of the remaining pages of this work will be filled with a description of how this result worked itself out.

At first, however, it seemed that owing to the Mahratta's leader's character their independence would soon come to an end. Sambhaji was hopeless. He had as his chief adviser a Brahmin from the north called Kalusha. Like master, like man, both were dissipated to a degree, and many of the Mahratta chiefs were totally alienated by their conduct. Listen for a moment to Khafi Khan on this point. He tells us that "When he was staying along with Abdur Razaq Lari near the fort of Rahiri, which Sivaji built, he heard from the people of the neighbourhood that Sivaji, although an infidel, and a rebel, was a wise man. The country round may be called a specimen of Hell, for it is hilly and stony, and in the hot season water is very scarce, which is a great trouble to the inhabitants. Sivaji had a well dug near his abode. A pavement was laid down round the mouth, and a stone seat was erected. Upon this bench Sivaji would take his seat, and when the women of the traders and poor people came to draw water, he would give their children fruit, and talk to the women as to his mother and sisters. When the raj descended to Sambha, he also used to sit upon this bench; and when the wives and daughters of the raiyats came to draw water, the vile dog would lay one hand upon their pitcher, and another upon their waist, and drag them to the seat. There he would handle them roughly and indecently, and detain them for a while. The poor woman unable to help herself, would dash the pitcher from her head, but she could not escape without gross insult. At length the raiyats of the country settled by his father abandoned it, and fled to the territory of the Feringis, which is not far off."* The Feringis here mentioned would be the Portuguese. It was obvious that a ruler of this sort, in spite of his occasional reckless daring, could not continue long. At first, however, he found as an ally, a power before which the greatest powers in India tremble, the plague. Aurangzeb's first general campaign against him was stopped by this disease. The great standing camp at Bijapur to which place

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 341.

Aurangzeb had to remove his head-quarters, had to be broken up. On the troops being removed from the town and cantooned in the open, the disease abated, a remedy as efficient then as now. Shortly after Sambhaji was captured by a clever coup de main. Mukarab Khan, a Moghul cavalry leader, accompanied by his son Ikhlas Khan and a small mixed force of horse and foot, marched with great celerity from Kolapur to Sangameswar, where Sambhaji and his Brahmin minister were spending their time in debauchery, and took them completely unawares. A short fight ensued; most of Sambhaji's followers managed to get away, but he himself, though he attempted disguise, was seized and made a prisoner. Along with him were captured his son Sahu, a lad of seven, and the obnoxious Kalusha. Their conqueror received due honour for his daring exploit. The chief and the minister were brought before Aurangzeb in Durbar. There the indomitable spirit of the Mahratta and of the Brahmin showed itself. On the pair being brought before the Emperor, the latter made two rukaats as a mark of his gratitude to the Almighty. The Brahmin on seeing this repeated certain Hindee lines of which the following is a translation: "O Raja, at the sight of thee the King Alamgir (Aurangzeb), for all his pomp and dignity cannot keep his seat upon his throne, but has perforce descended from it to do thee honour."*

After their capture it was suggested to Aurangzeb that their lives might be preserved and they might be made instruments whereby the Moghuls could take possession of the Mahratta fortresses, now so numerous, all over the Ghats. But Aurangzeb was not inclined to fall in with such plans, and if he had been so inclined, the language of Sambhaji would have prevented him carrying any such plan out. On being asked whether he would become a Mussalman, Sambhaji replied that he would, provided that Aurangzeb would marry him to his daughter. This was intended to be and was a most unpardonable insult. Both Sambhaji and his minister were put to death in public at Tolapur in August 1689. Sahu, the son, remained as a hostage in Aurangzeb's camp. During the remaining years of the reign, though Raja Ram a young son of Sivaji, was nominally most of the time the nominal head of the Mahrattas, they had really no one person as their guiding spirit. A number of Brahmin ministers, working each for their own hand, superintended all Mahratta affairs. And perhaps it was just as well from a Mahratta point of view that this was so. Their power now being scattered all over the country, it was impossible for the Moghul Generals to effectually put it down. There being no head, all blows delivered ceased to vitally injure the body politic. Crushed in one place, they reappeared in another. The story of the last eighteen years of Aurangzeb's life down to his death in 1707 A. D. is in the main nothing more than a story of futile skirmishes, of long and tiresome sieges, of much country overrun, but of little retained, and of the gradual draining of the Moghul strength.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 340.

The various Mahratta Chiefs met together after Sambhaji's capture to settle their mutual action in the future. Among them were prominent Prilhad Niraji, the man of thought, and Santaji Ghorepurai, the man of action. Raja Ram, the younger son of Sivaji, was elected as the Mahratta Chief. It was settled by his advisers that he should not remain at any one place but move about from one Western Ghat fort to another, and that if there was any great fear of his being captured, he should move to Ginjee in the Carnatic, away south, not far from the present Madras, where it was hoped he would be out of the range of the Moghul power. The fortresses were put in a state of repair, provisions were stored therein and Sivaji's rules as to the cutting and stacking of fodder for the horses from the pasture lands under the forts were strictly carried out. The Moghul army lumbering along, now besieged one fort, now another, and after sieges generally prolonged, got possession of several of the most powerful of these, including Raigarh itself. Thereupon Ramchander Punt was chosen by the Mahrattas to take supreme control in Mahratta land, and it was settled that Raja Ram should proceed to Ginjee. To get there across a country swarming with troops of all sorts was no easy matter, and it was only after various adventures that he with several other chief followers disguised as Lingayat Brahmins managed to reach that place in safety. As soon as he got there he formally sat on the throne and began to issue sanads and grants, conferring lands not only in but outside the limits of Maharashtra country to his adherents, and so started claims which though shadowy at the time, afterwards became of the greatest practical importance to the persons to whom they had been granted or to their descendants. Aurangzeb about this time took to passing further orders in his anti-Hindu crusade. No Hindu without special permission, so the edict ran, should ride on an Arab horse or be carried in a palki. Other orders directing that the Hindi form of spelling words such as Malwa, Bengala with a final h should be discontinued and the Arabic form used in its place, show that the old man's desires to proselytise had degenerated into senile dotage. Under a ruler so advanced in years and yet so desirous to do everything himself it was hardly to be expected that the Moghuls would gain much way. A large force of them under Zulfikar Khan indeed, of whom we shall hear more than once again during the next twenty years, sat down leisurely before Ginjee, which place was besieged off and on for the next seven years. As to the army moving through and through Maharashtra, what it gained one year it lost the next; a fort taken with much difficulty would fall without any trouble again into Mahratta hands; and what was worst of all for the Moghuls, the Mahrattas were now beginning to think themselves capable of meeting the Imperial armies in the open field. Aurangzeb in A. D. 1698 established his head-quarters at Brahmapur on the Beema. Here an enormous cantonment was built and for years this obscure village was the seat of the Moghul Empire. From here expeditions were sent out which but rarely effected anything. Save the very ground the Moghul armies trod upon, no part of the Deccan seemed safe from the Mahratta raiders. These persons now began to demand a third tax from the wretched inhabitants whose countries they overran. They already were demanding Chouth and Sirdeshmukhi. Now they began to take from the inhabitants what they called ghas dana—a levy of money and kind for the purpose of feeding their horses. Everywhere outside the Mahratta chiefs' domain was wrack and ruin. Foremost amongst these Mahratta chieftains, was Santaji Ghorepurai whom I have already mentioned. Khafi Khan writes of him thus: "Santa more especially distinguished himself in ravaging the cultivated districts, and in attacking the royal leaders. Everyone who encountered him was either killed or wounded and made prisoner; or if any one did escape, it was with his mere life, with the loss of his army and baggage. Nothing could be done, for wherever the accursed dog went and threatened an attack, there was no Imperial amir bold enough to resist him, and every loss he inflicted on their forces made the boldest warriors quake. Ismail Khan was accounted one of the bravest and most skilful warriors of the Dakhin, but he was defeated in the first action, his army was plundered, and he himself was wounded and made prisoner. After some months he obtained his release on the payment of a large sum of money. So also Rustam Khan, otherwise called Sharza Khan, the Rustam of the time and as brave as a lion, was defeated by Santaji in the district of Sattara, and after losing his baggage and all that he had with him, was taken prisoner, and had to pay a large sum for his ransom. Ali Mardan Khan otherwise called Husaini Beg Haidarabadi, was defeated and made prisoner with several others. After a detention of some days, they obtained their release paying a ransom of two lacs of rupees.

These evil tidings greatly troubled Aurangzeb. Further, news came that Santa had fought with Jan Nisar Khan and Tahawur Khan, on the borders of the Carnatic, and had inflicted upon them a severe defeat and the loss of their artillery and baggage. Jan Nisar was wounded, and escaped with difficulty. Tahawur Khan was also wounded and lay among the dead, but was restored to life. Many other renowned amirs met with similar defeats. Aurangzeb was greatly distressed, but in public he said that the creature could do nothing for everything was in the hands of God."*

In the meantime the Emperor had drifted into war with both the Portuguese and the English. The former were obnoxious to him for many reasons. The Roman Catholic form of worship. so different from the simple and severe forms enjoined on Muhammedans was displeasing to him ; the Portuguese habit of making proselytes from their Muhammedan subjects still more so ; and their having taken possession of a considerable part of the old Bijapur Kingdom, and that by no means the least important part, was also highly resented by the aged Emperor. Add to this that their sea power, though very different from what it was a century previous, was still too much for the Moghuls to compete with and we have plenty of occasion for Aurangzeb's dislike. The English, on the other hand, cared no whit for making proselytes and did not aim at any land power. On the other hand, they both sheltered pirates and were, I am afraid, too apt to commit actions which would now be termed piratical themselves. In particular they ruled the Arabian Sea almost absolutely, a matter of special offence to Aurangzeb, as this was for an orthodox Indian Sunni by far the most convenient way to Mecca. Khafi Khan as to this remarks : "The total revenue of Bombay, which is chiefly derived from betel-nuts and cocoanuts, does not reach to two or three lacs of rupees. The profits of the commerce of these misbelievers, according to report, does not exceed twenty lacs of rupees. The balance of the money required for the maintenance of the English settlement is obtained by plundering the ships voyaging to the House of God, of which they take one or two every year. When the ships are proceeding to the ports of Mocha and Jedda laden with the goods of Hindustan they do not interfere with them ; but when they return bringing gold and silver and Ibrahimi and rial,* their spies have found out which ship bears the richest burden, and they attack it."† Whether this is literally true or not, there is no doubt that the English adventurers in the Eastern seas in those days paid but little obedience to the laws of nations if they found an opportunity of loot. When they captured the Ganj Sawai, the largest of the Moghul ships proceeding from Surat to Mocha, their cup of iniquity in the Emperor's eyes was full and he ordered their factory and their factors at Surat to be seized. These orders were but imperfectly carried out. The Muhammedan historian naively tells us that the Governor of Surat knowing what a loss to the revenue a quarrel with the English would be, made no serious attempt to put the royal orders into execution. The English, on the other hand, acted vigorously, and after a time Aurangzeb forgot his wrath and agreed that things should go on as they did before. The English even then were too good aids to the royal revenue by reason of their trade to be lightly driven away, and they had already made Bombay a fortress impregnable to land attack. With the Portuguese too a peace was patched up, the Emperor's advisers telling him that thereby he would be able to obtain cannon which he might use against the Mahrattas. In the meantime the siege of Ginjee was going aimlessly on. Aurangzeb had given the real command as I have said to Zulfikar Khan, who with his father Asad Khan were now the chief nobles of the Empire, but according to his ordinary policy he had associated with them his son Prince Kambaksh. Santaji fresh from his triumphs in the past burst upon the besiegers, destroyed their forage parties, intercepted their supplies and defeated the troops sent against him. He spread also the news that the old Emperor was dead. The result was striking. Zulfikar Khan and his father, declaring that Prince Kambaksh believed this report and was about to claim the throne, seized him and making a treaty with their Mahratta opponents, raised the siege.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 347.

---

* Rial = 1 U. S. Dollar.

† Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 351.

Aurangzeb was greatly displeased. The Prince was set at liberty but not permitted to return to the army. Zulfikar was directed to renew the siege, which he did in the same leisurely way as before. It was not till early in 1698 A. D., that Ginjee was finally taken and that only because Zulfikar Khan had become at last afraid of the Emperor's serious displeasure, if he still protracted operations. This general was all along suspected of taking bribes from his opponents, and certain it was that when Ginjee was taken most of the chief Mahrattas and a great part of the wealth therein had gone. The wives and family of Raja Ram were granted a safe conduct to Maharashtra and were sent there by sea.

Previous to the capture of Ginjee the Moghuls had suffered the worst defeat from the Mahrattas which they had hitherto experienced. In the Bijapur Carnatic not far from Chitaldrug stands a small fort Dandin. Kasim Khan, the Foujdar of the Bijapur Subah, marched out from his headquarters to put a stop to the endless Mahratta raids in his district, and being surrounded on all sides and without food was forced to take refuge in his little fort, leaving half his troops outside. To his rescue came one Himat Khan. Santaji, who was in command of the Mahrattas, was vigorously attacked by this leader and forced to flee, but the Moghuls when in pursuit were themselves attacked and a musket ball killing Himat Khan, his troops dispersed. The troops at Dandin after suffering great hardships surrendered. Kasim Khan is said to have committed suicide. The other chiefs were put to ransom. The whole of the Moghul stores fell into Mahratta hands.

Their value is calculated by Khafi Khan to have been more than sixty lacs of rupees. This happened in A. D. 1696.*

Santaji did not long survive the capture of Ginjee. He is reported to have been an austere man, very severe in his discipline and his punishments. For a trifling offence it is said he would cast a man under the feet of an elephant. And so the Mahrattas did not love him, and Raja Ram, whose fame he overshadowed, least of all. Thus it happened that he was deserted by his own countrymen and hunted to death by the Moghuls. It was a Mahratta Nagoji Manai Deshmukh of Muswar, whose brother had been caused to be thrown by Santaji under an elephant, who finally tracked him down and slew him, while bathing in a small stream, alone and unarmed. His head was duly sent to Aurangzeb and Nagoji was duly pardoned by Aurangzeb—for he was at the time in rebellion—and restored to his old position.

The camp at Brahmपुरi was, after the capture of Ginjee, broken up. The cantonment indeed remained, but the whole of the troops were ordered out on active service to the holy war, as Aurangzeb considered it, and Khafi Khan calls it. The first place of consequence to be besieged was Sattara. The move on it was sudden, and Ram Chunder, the chief Mahratta minister, was suspected of having treacherously left the place unsupplied with the necessary stores. However it took not only almost the whole of 1699 A. D., but the first part of 1700 A. D. to take it. The first attempt at mining ended disastrously for the besiegers. A portion of the rock was blown up, but instead of falling into the fortress, as was expected, it came on the heads of the besiegers below. The Emperor is said to have been much troubled by this result. When he was informed of it and the despondency of his men, "he mounted his horse, and went to the scene of action as if in search of death. He gave orders that the bodies of the dead should be piled upon each other, and made to serve as shields against the arrows of calamity; then with the ladder of resolution, and the scaling-ropes of boldness, the men should rush to the assault."* Another curious fact is reported by Khafi Khan about this misfortune. "A great number of Hindu infantry soldiers had been killed all at once (in the explosion), and their friends were unable to seek and bring out their bodies. The violence of the shock had entirely disfigured them, and it was not possible to distinguish between Mussalman and Hindu, friend and stranger. The flames of animosity burst forth among all the gunners against the commander of the artillery. So at night they secretly set fire to the defences (marhala), which had been raised at great trouble and expense against the fire from above, in the hope and with the design that the fire might reach the corpses of the slaughtered Hindus. A great conflagration followed, and for the space of a week served as a bright lamp both for besiegers and besieged. A number of Hindus and Mussalmans who were alive in the huts were unable to escape, and were burnt, the living with the dead."† Sattara surrendered on terms in April 1700. A month previous to this Raja Ram died. Tara Bai, his senior wife, as regent to her son, succeeded him as ruler of the Mahrattas. This woman showed remarkable aptitude for rule and was a more formidable opponent than either Sambhaji or Raja Ram had been before her. Things in the Moghul Camp went on from bad to worse. After Sattara another fort, Parli, was besieged and taken, and then when there was thought of returning, as the rainy season was upon them, it was found how much easier it is to march an army into the hilly Western Ghats than to bring it back. The baggage animals were skin and bone; there were no means of conveying the stores; and to add to the misery, the Kistna River was found in full flood; many were drowned in the passage and when the army did at length get across, it had shrunk into very small dimensions. Aurangzeb still kept up hope; but as for his officers and men, probably their utmost wish was that the old man would die and that their endless wanderings should have an end. But for six years more he still remained alive, ever hoping, ever scheming but never getting any nearer his aim.

---

* So Grant Duff. Elliot puts it earlier.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 306.

† Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 306.

The Mahrattas on their side were ever getting bolder, though at the same time the wise methods of Sivaji were being gradually abandoned, and a larger share of the loot, now so abundant, was being approximated by the soldier and less by the State. Many of these Mahrattas were in the Moghul service and these were as great robbers as their enemies. It is said that these Moghul-employed Mahrattas would pray jestingly for a long life for Aurangzeb, knowing that as long as he lived they would not be disturbed in their vocation of plunder. The Emperor actually began to buy the forts from their commanders with the natural result of increasing the wealth of the Mahratta leaders and of causing ever new forts to spring up, the commandants of which were also only too eager to be bought. Peace was suggested, and it was proposed to release Sahu, Sambhaji's son, from his captivity and to allow him to return to his countrymen; but Aurangzeb, though at first willing, finally declined.

As long as he had any life left, he was determined to continue in the old way. The record of these last few years is exceedingly tedious and uninteresting. Siege after siege; what the Moghul won one day, was regained the next by the Mahratta, but everywhere suffering, terrible suffering for the peaceful inhabitants of the country. The last of the great sieges of the reign was that of Wakinkera. This fort was defended for months by Parya Naik, a low caste man, whose chief adherents were low class Muhammedans.

Hired Mahratta troops approaching to raise the siege, the Moghuls declined to meet them in the field. When at last Zulfikar Khan with a large force approached, the besieged found occasion to pass through the blockading lines and to join the Mahrattas. Only the disabled and wounded were found in the fort A. D. 1704. This was the last military act of any importance in the Emperor's reign. An old man of ninety, he was more than once ill for months, before his final fatal illness which took place in 1707 A. D. At Ahmednuggur, at an age far exceeding that ordinarily allotted to mortal man, the last of the really great Moghul Emperors died. His last twenty years had been spent in the Deccan. The political history of Hindustan, India north of the Vindhya, had during this time been almost a blank. The Jats of Bharatpur had once or twice given trouble; but the Emperor had given up all attempts to worry the Rajputs, and they on their part had ceased to worry him. Matters seemingly went on smoothly, save for occasional outbursts of petty rebellion and of some sort of retaliation. In reality it would seem as if on the whole these were twenty years of rest for the north. It was indeed subject to a constant drain for the Deccan wars, but these did not reach its borders. Within twenty years the Mahrattas will trouble as much in the north as in the south, but for the present there was peace in this northern land.

Shortly before his death Aurangzeb is reported to have written to his sons the following letters: Unlike the speech to his tutor reported by Bernier, these would seem to be really Aurangzeb's own. To his son, Azam Shah, he wrote:—"Health to thee, My heart is near thee. Old age is arrived: weakness subdues me, and strength has forsaken all my members. I came a stranger into this world, and a stranger I depart. I know nothing of myself, what I am, and for what I am destined. The instant which passed in power, hath left only sorrow behind it. I have not been the guardian and protector of the Empire. My valuable time has been NOTE.—Aurangzeb in A. D. 1668 forbade the writing of the history of his reign. Khafi Khan himself surreptitiously put together his notes from which he framed his history after the Emperor's death, and so it may be that this blank means only the want of a chronicler. But if there had been events of any great importance, one may be certain that there would have been order or no order, some account of them.

passed vainly. I had a patron in my own dwelling (conscience), but His glorious light was unseen by my dim sight. Life is not lasting, there is no vestige of departing breath, and all hopes from futurity are lost. The fever has left me, but nothing of me remains but skin and bone. My son (Kaum Buksh), though gone towards Bijapur is still near; and thou, my son, are yet nearer. The worthy of esteem, Shah Alam, is far distant; and my grandson (Azeem Ooshaun), by the orders of God, is arrived near Hindustan. The camp and followers, helpless and alarmed, are like myself, full of affliction, restless as the quicksilver. Separated from their lord, they know not if they have a master or not. I brought nothing into this world, and, except the infirmities of man, carry nothing out. I have a dread for my salvation, and with what torments I may be punished. Though I have strong reliance on the mercies and bounty of God, yet, regarding my actions, fear will not quit me; but when I am gone reflection will not remain. Come then what may, I have launched my vessel to the waves. Though Providence will protect the camp yet, regarding appearances, the endeavours of my sons are indispensably incumbent. Give my last prayers to my grandson (Bedar Bukht), whom I cannot see, but the desire affects me. The Begam (his daughter) appears afflicted; but God is the only judge of hearts. The foolish thoughts of women produce nothing but disappointment. Farewell. Farewell. Farewell. Farewell.'*'

To Prince Kaum Buksh he wrote:—"My son, nearest to my heart. Though in the height of my power, and by God's permission I gave you advice, and took with you the greatest pains, yet, as it was not the divine will, you did not attend with the ears of compliance. Now I depart a stranger, and lament my own insignificance, what does it profit me? I carry with me the fruits of my sins and imperfections. Surprising Providence, I came here alone, and alone I depart. The leader of this caravan hath deserted me. The fever which troubled me for twelve days, hath left me. Wherever I look I see nothing but the divinity. My fears for the camp and followers are great; but, alas! I know not myself. My back is bent with weakness and my feet have lost the powers of motion. The breath which rose is gone, and left not even hope behind it. I have committed numerous crimes, and know not with what punishments I may be seized. Though the protector of mankind will guard the camp, yet care is incumbent on the faithful and my sons. When I was alive, no care was taken: and now I am gone; the consequence may be guessed. The guardianship of a people is the trust by God committed to my sons. Azam Shah is near. Be cautious that none of the faithful are slain, or their miseries fall upon my head. I resign you, your mother and son, to God, as I myself am going. The agonies of death come upon me fast. Bahadur Shah is still where he was and his son is arrived near Hindostan. Bedar Bukht is in Guzarat. Hyaut-al-Nissa, who has beheld no afflictions of time till now, is full of sorrows. Regard the Begam as without concern. Oodiporee your mother, was a partner in my illness, and wishes to accompany me in death; but everything has its appointed time.”* These letters are full of the deepest pathos. The dread of future punishment, the consciousness of crime, of conscience disobeyed, of opportunity mispent and the hope, the only half hope in the mercy of God. Muhammedanism as professed by Aurangzeb was very much Calvinism without Christ, the strong feeling of a merciful God expressed so often in the Koran disappears, and nothing is left but the awful Judge.

---

* Todd, Vol. I, p. 319.

‘Quando tremor est futurus
Quando Judex est venturus.’

Hardly ever has the fear of judgment produced such a cry.

The Muhammedan historian writing of his character says:—
“Of all the sovereigns of the house of Timur—nay, of all the sovereigns of Delhi—no one—since Sikander Lodi, has ever been apparently so distinguished for devotion, austerity, and justice. In courage, long-suffering and sound judgment, he was unrivalled. But from reverence for the injunctions of the Law he did not make use of punishment, and without punishment the administration of a country cannot be maintained. Dissensions had arisen among his nobles through rivalry. So every plan and project that he formed came to little good ; and every enterprise which he undertook was long in execution, and failed of its object. Although he lived for ninety years, his five senses were not at all impaired, except his hearing, and that to only so slight an extent that it was not perceptible to others. He often passed his nights in vigils and devotion, and he denied himself many pleasures naturally belonging to humanity.’’*

* Todd, Vol. 1, p. 320.

What does history say of Aurangzeb ? Its almost unanimous voice is what Akbar built up, that Aurangzeb undermined, so that its ruin was only a matter of time. And this judgment is just. When Shah Jahan was dethroned, the Empire was still flourishing ; compared with other Eastern Kingdoms, most flourishing. India is very fertile and though the royal state of Shah Jahan could not be kept up without much expense, and though the great satraps imitated him in profuse expenditure, we have no reason to believe that taxation was unduly severe. Where carriage was so expensive and uncertain, most articles produced on the spot, were consumed on the spot. The Indian's wants as a rule are but few, and provided the monsoon rains came with anything like punctuality, the ryots, as far as we can learn, got enough to eat in this seventeenth century and as far as their scanty requirements in the way of clothing were concerned, they were probably as well off then, as far at least, as the simplest sort of clothing was concerned, as they are now. Of any thing like comforts, the average rustic Indian at present has none, nor had he any then. In large towns indeed wants are greater. Most of the large towns in those days were provincial capitals and the fragments from the rich officials' tables there would naturally come to the poor. The great want of India then, as indeed now, was peace ; and peace during the seventeenth century Northern India had ; but as the century grew to its close this peace was affected by the constant demand of men and money for the Deccan. The former demand Hindustan could well spare from its teeming population ; but the latter demand drained the country of all its superfluous wealth.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 386.

It has often been stated that Aurangzeb's cardinal error was in his overthrowing the Muhammedan States of Bijapur and Golkonda and not letting them remain as a barrier against the Mah-rattas, and an error it doubtless was. But as far as his army administration was concerned, Aurangzeb's fundamental error was his neglect of a sufficient supply of efficient soldiers from the North-Western border and beyond. The soldiers from these lands had been in the Moghul palmy days their great standby. It was only with such troops, foreign indeed as the English now are foreign, that a compact army could be brought together, capable of doing the work required from it. Aurangzeb, though a great proselytiser, seems not to have encouraged in any special way foreign Muham-medans ; and so his army was full of Indian Muhammedans, of far inferior strength and virility. Early in the reign the great stand-by of the Empire had been the Rajput auxiliaries ; but as the reign proceeded, less and less confidence could be placed in them, until towards the close, the strong bond of fealty which had held them to the Empire had almost snapped. And here we come to Aurangzeb's crowning fault ; he had many virtues, temperance, perseverance, where dynastic feelings were not concerned he was often merciful ; he had also many vices of which dissimulation and ambition were the chief, but vices, virtues, were all of less importance in influencing his career than the fact that he was a bigot. What Akbar had gained, what Jahangir and Shah Jahan with all their vices had retained, he lost, viz., the affection of his Hindu subjects. That this can be acquired for a Muhammedan ruler without doing injustice to his co-religionists has been shown over and over again in Indian History. And no power that has not acquired the confidence of the Hindu community can be expected to last in India. Intolerance in Aurangzeb's time meant intolerance in religious matters, but intolerance can, and at the present day often does, extend to matters not religious. Impatience at opposition, a belief that no one can be right save oneself, a feeling of contempt for all that does not tally with one's own ideas, all these are a form of intolerance and one that at times can be seen in statesmen of the present days. But the warning of history stands ever there, so that he who runs may read. The English won India by pursuing the methods of Akbar, let them not lose it by imitating those of Aurangzeb.*

---

* NOTE—By this I do not mean of course that England's policy should be guided by what the Hindu—especially the more vociferous Hindu asks. Respect for Hindu ideas (prejudices if you will), strict justice without respect of persons, taxation which does not unduly worry—such are much more important items in gaining the confidence of the most of our Hindu fellow-subjects than any political concession.

BAHADUR SHAH.

AURANGZEB left three sons, Shah Alam who afterwards became Emperor under the name of Bahadur Shah, Azam Shah and Kaum Buksh. I have already mentioned that Shah Alam had fallen under his father's suspicion some 20 years earlier and had been for years in captivity and also that on his release he had been sent as Viceroy to Cabul. There he remained till the time of his father's death. While there, he had the good fortune to attach to his cause Munim Khan, the Dewan of the Province of Lahore. Accordingly when the news of his father's death came, he found at his back both the soldiery of the Cabul and Lahore Subahs and not only this, but also through Munim Khan's activity he had to hand a fully equipped commissariat and ample transport. Two of his sons were at the time Viceroys of Multan and Bengal respectively, and so a large part of the country was already under his control. The son at Multan joined his father as soon as he entered Hindustan, and the other son made forced marches from Bengal in order to anticipate any attempts made to cut him off from Upper India.

Azam Shah, the second son, had been in attendance on his father shortly before the latter's death. Aurangzeb, who ever remembered the treatment he dealt out to his own father, would not allow this son of his to remain with him during his last days but directed him to proceed from the Imperial camp and take possession of the Viceroyalty of Malwa. As soon, however, as this son heard that his father had breathed his last, he returned to the Imperial camp, had the Khutba read in his own name and ascended the Imperial throne. Kaum Buksh, the third and favourite son of Aurangzeb, had also been sent away by his father about the same time as his elder brother Azam Shah. According to the wishes of his father, the Kingdom of Bijapur should have been his appanage. It was stated indeed that Aurangzeb before dying, had expressed his wish that Shah Alam should become the Emperor: that Azam Shah should hold the Deccan save Bijapur and that Bijapur should be the portion of his third son. However this may be, the adage so often quoted in Eastern History again turned out true. No country is big enough for two Kings, and thus it happened that each of the three princes made up their minds or had their minds made up for them that one of them and one alone should become Emperor of Aurangzeb's vast dominion. Shah Alam indeed, it is said, was willing to allow his brothers the shares in the Deccan left them by their father but neither of these younger brothers were willing. The first to encounter were Shah Alam and Azam Shah. There was a race between these two, as to who should reach Agra first: Shah Alam won. The Commander who held the fort there, is said to have informed Azam Shah that he would surrender it to the prince who was the first to arrive, and so it happened that the whole of the treasure which had been accumulated in that stronghold during the time of Shah Jahan, and which had been left hardly touched by Aurangzeb, fell into the new Emperor's hands. Azam Shah, although too late, marched all the same straight towards the Imperial City. He is said to have disgusted his adherents both by his stinginess and by his pride and so many left him on the road. One thing which he did do, deserves to be remembered and that was the releasing of Sivaji (better known by his nick name Sahu (thief) given him by Aurangzeb), Sambhaji's son who for many years had been Aurangzeb's prisoner. The two armies met at Jhaju, about 15 miles from Agra, and although in a preliminary skirmish the troops of Azam Shah obtained the advantage, still on the decisive day the battle seems from the first to have gone against the younger brother. Zulfikar Khan who was commanding on Azam Shah's side, when he saw that the day was lost, that many of his valiant companions in arms were slain, and that Azam Shah's army was pressed so hard that there was no hope of deliverance, went to the Prince and said, 'Your ancestors have had to endure the same kind of reverse, and have been deprived of their armies: but they did not refuse to do what the necessities of the case required. The best course for you now is to leave the field of battle, and to remove to a distance, when fortune may perhaps assist you, and you may retrieve your reverse.' Azam Shah flew into a rage, and said: 'Go, with your bravery, and save your life wherever you can: it is impossible for me to leave this field: for princes there is (only the choice of) a throne or a bier' (takht ya takhta).*

The choice was not long in coming, for as the Muhammedan Historian says 'as the sun of his life was setting an arrow struck him and his existence came to an end.' Shah Alam was exceedingly merciful after his victory. The children of Azam Shah were not put to death, as had become the invariable custom, and Zulfikar Khan was received into the Imperial service. The next year 1708 saw the end of the civil war. The Emperor was willing to allow Kaum Buksh to retain Bijapur and also to add to this the kingdom of Golkonda, but Kaum Buksh who was both proud and cruel would not listen to his brother's conciliatory messages and really forced the Emperor to march against him. The result was never in doubt, although in the battle which ensued Kaum Buksh himself showed the most reckless bravery. He and his sons, who were desperately wounded, were captured and taken to near the royal tent. "European and Greek Surgeons were appointed to attend them. Kaum Buksh rejected all treatment, and refused to take the broth prepared for his food. In the evening the king went to see his brother. He sat down by his side, and took the cloak from his own back, and covered him, who lay dejected and despairing, fallen from throne and fortune. He showed him the greatest kindness, asked him about his state, and said, 'I never wished to see you in this condition.' Kaum Buksh replied, 'Neither did I wish that one of the race of Timur should be made prisoner with the imputation of cowardice and want of spirit.' The king gave him two or three spoonfuls of broth with his own hands, and then departed with his eyes full of tears. Three or four watches afterwards, Kaum Buksh and one of his sons named Firozmand died.† Both corpses were sent to Delhi, to be interred near the tomb of Humayun.”* Shah Alam now reigned without a rival.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 399.

† A. D. 1708.

Although of a merciful character and tolerant disposition the new Emperor was but little fitted to sustain the burden of Sovereignty which had been thrust upon him. His generosity was really lavishness. It is said that he could never refuse a request. In any case within a very exceedingly short time the whole of the late Emperor's treasure, which was stored up in the Agra fort with so much care, had almost entirely vanished, and after his reign no more do we learn of great Imperial Reserves. The Muhammedan Historian who certainly desired to give this Emperor as good a character as he could, tells us how, owing to his good nature and his inability to deny requests, the ugly practice arose of giving the same title to two or more persons. This of itself would show that the rule of order in the Moghul dominions was coming to an end.

The Emperor's character is summed up by this Historian in these words: “For generosity, munificence, boundless good nature, extenuation of faults, and forgiveness of offences, very few monarchs have been found equal to Bahadur Shah in the histories of past times, and especially in the race of Timur. But though he had no vice in his character, such complacency and such negligence were exhibited in the protection of the state and in the government and management of the country, that witty sarcastic people found the date of his accession in the words, Shah-i be-khabr, ‘Heedless King.’ He often sat up all night, and used to sleep to the middle of the day; so in marching his people had to suffer great inconvenience; for many poor fellows were unable to find their tents in dark nights when the army and baggage were scattered about, and had to pass the night in front of the royal tent, or the drum room or offices or the bazars.”† In other words, he was by no means fitted to rule the Moghul dominions in the troublesome days which had now come.

Zulfikar Khan, his father Asad Khan and Munim Khan who was made Khan Khanan, were the chief Ministers in this reign.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 407—408.

† Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 410.

Asad Khan himself was made Wazir, but he was by this time an old man and although of great influence did really but little—the mass of the work falling upon the other two. The Khan Khanan was a Sufi and probably it was largely under his influence that the Emperor became, if not a Shiah, still well affected to this form of the Muhammedan faith. This he showed first of all by directing that the word “wasi” (heir) should be inserted in the Kutbah after the name of the Caliph Ali, the son-in-law of the prophet. The Sunnis were up in arms. From all parts of the Empire, from Lahore, Agra and Ahmedabad, came reports of opposition. In the last named place the Khatib, who pronounced the Kutbah with the innovation in it as ordered, was torn from the pulpit, seized by his skirts and so severely stabbed that he died. At Lahore where the Emperor was, the chief Muhammedan Doctors of the place awaited upon the Emperor and stated their objections. After the method of Akbar’s days the discussions that followed took up several days. The Emperor finally yielded, more probably on account of the fear of disturbances, than of conviction. The Mussulmans of Lahore were practically of one accord in the matter and the obnoxious word had never, in spite of the Imperial orders, been used in the pulpits. Finally, the Emperor ordered that the Kutbah should be recited as it was in the days of Aurangzeb, i.e., without the wasi. All the same the Emperor showed his displeasure by imprisoning in a fortress the leading Sunni Doctors.*

The Khan Khanan discharged his duties as Wazir with great justice and clemency. One matter he set right. He afforded a relief rightly demanded by the Mansabdars (holders of Mansabs). These men’s Mansabs had been charged in the previous reign with the support of the royal and the provincial officers’ cattle. This charge, by methods well known in the East, had been turned into an intolerable oppression; very often the whole income of the Mansabdar was not nearly sufficient for the purpose. It can easily be understood how the officer whose duty it was to enforce this service, not only demanded that the cattle should be fed, but that they themselves also should be paid. The consequence too often was the torturing of the Mansabdars and of their servants. Complaints had been frequently made to Aurangzeb, but he was too merged in his political schemes to pay much attention. Now the whole system was abolished; a deduction of a money payment was substituted in lieu of the obligation to feed the cattle. Such a change from kind into money had obvious merits but is rarely acceptable to native officials, and very often is not so to the person who has to pay.

---

* A. D. 1710.

A change, for it cannot be called a reform, of a very different nature was also made at the time, by which the Emperor affixed to his name on the coins, the title "Sayid." This word had since the early days of Islam come to mean a descendant of the prophet. None of the previous Emperors had claimed this honour and I am afraid it would have been very hard to substantiate. However, all things are possible with the Masters of Kingdoms.

The Khan Khanan died shortly before his master. He was one of the last really good Ministers that the Moghul Emperors employed, and yet Khafi Khan's description of him is sufficient to show how the Moghul Statesmen had degenerated since the reign of Akbar.

"He was a man inclined to Suffism, and was a friend to the poor. During all the time of his power he gave pain to no one. But the best intentions are often perverted into wrong deeds. It entered the mind of Khan Khanan that he would build in every city a sarai, a mosque, or a monastery, to bear his name. So he wrote to the Subahdars and Diwans of different places about the purchase of ground and the building of sarais, mosques, and colleges. He gave strict injunctions and also sent bills for large sums of money. When his order reached the place, all the officials had regard to the high dignity, and looking upon his order as a mandate from heaven, they directed their attention to the building of the sarais in their respective cities. In some places ground fit for the purpose was freely sold by the owners; but it happened in other places that although the officials were desirous of buying suitable land, they could not obtain it with the consent of the owners. Considering only their own authority, and the necessity of satisfying Khan Khanan, the officials forcibly seized upon many houses which had been occupied by the owners and their ancestors for generations, and drove the proprietors out of their hereditary property. Numbers of Mussulmans, Sayids and Hindus were thus driven, sighing and cursing, out of their old homes, as it happened at Burhanpur and at Surat.''*

The curse of all Eastern Kingdoms is here shown and the desire to do some meritorious actions without considering the means and ways by which such can be brought about.

As regards Bahadur Shah's dealings with his non-Muhammedan subjects, three matters call for special mention. First of all, the dealings with the Rajputs; secondly, with the Sikhs, and thirdly, the progress of the Mahratta power during his reign. As regards the third, it will be more convenient to deal with it later on when I finish my general history of the period of short reigns commencing with Bahadur Shah and ending with the coming to the throne of Muhammad Shah. As regards the Rajputs, the tyranny of Aurangzeb had completely alienated them from the Empire. We are told that Raja Ajit Singh, as soon as Aurangzeb died, forbade the killing of cows, prevented the Muazzim calling to prayer, desecrated the Mosques which had been built, and began erecting new temples. Accordingly Imperial armies marched through the plain country of Rajputana again and again; but finally chiefly owing to the troubles with the Sikhs, the Emperor contented himself with nominal homage and Rajputana seems from this time to have become practically free from Imperial interference. Never again could its princes be relied upon to support the Empire or the reigning Emperor. The chief Rajas of the country, those of Mewar, Ambar, and Marwar; the modern Udaipur, Jaipur, and Jodhpur joined into a triple league of mutual defence in which amongst other terms was one that they would under no circumstances allow their daughters to marry into the Moghul Imperial family. It was also stipulated that where the Raja of one of the States married the daughter of the Raja of another, the eldest male heir of such marriage should succeed although the Raja might have had an elder child by another wife. This Tod justly remarks was the cause of much subsequent trouble and disunion, inasmuch as nowhere in the world have the laws of primogeniture been considered more sacred than by the Rajputs.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 425-426.

The troubles with the Sikhs who in this reign first began to play a prominent part in the history of the Punjab call for a longer notice. Before writing about them, however, it is desirable to give some account of the tenets and the rise of this extraordinary people.

The word Sikh means disciple and the main tenet of the Sikhs, that which distinguishes them most clearly from all other Hindu bodies, is their devotion to their spiritual preceptor, their Guru. The first Guru Nanak was born at Tahwandi near Lahore in 1469 A. D. He fell in early life under the influence of Kabir, a Muhammedan Mystic, who disgusted with the intolerance of his co-religionists, became a worshipper of Vishnu. This Vishnu, however, was the one God of the Universe and not simply one of the many gods of the Hindu Pantheon. The hardness, which characterises the views of God put forward by many Christian and Muhammedan theologians, finds no place in Kabir's teaching nor in that of his pupil Nanak. The burden of the latter's teaching was "that all men are alike in the eyes of the Almighty." He rejected the authority of the Brahmans and the virtue of their incantations and sacrifices, holding that salvation lay in repentance and in pure and righteous conduct, rather than in the pharisaical observance of a number of unintelligible rites. Like most Hindus, he believed in transmigration, but held that the successive stages were but means to purification, and that, at last, the soul, cleansed from its sin, returned to dwell with its Maker. 'He did not despise or attack the Hindu or Muhammedan teachers; he held, indeed, that they too had been sent from God, but he preached a higher and purer religion, embracing all that was best in both. He declared himself a prophet, but claimed neither direct inspiration nor miraculous powers. Nanak prescribed no caste rules or ceremonial observances, and indeed condemned them as unnecessary and even harmful; but he insisted on no alteration in existing institutions, and was content to leave the doctrine of the equality of all men in the sight of God to work its own conclusion in the minds of his followers. He respected the Hindu veneration of the cow and the Muhammedan abhorrence of the hog, but recommended as a higher rule than either, total abstinence from flesh. In short, he attacked nothing, he condemned nobody; but he sought to draw men's minds from the shadow to the substance, to glorify what was highest and best in the religion of each, and was content to leave to all men, at least for a while, the outward and visible signs to which they were traditionally accustomed. Nothing in fact could have been more gentle or less aggressive than his doctrine."

Nanak travelled through a great part of Upper India, visited Mecca and died at Kartarpur near Jullunder A.D. 1539. He was the first Guru of the Sikhs.

His disciples were recruited from the Hindu and Muhammedan Jats of the Punjab. Nine gurus in apostolic succession succeeded him. The first four gurus were merely leaders of a peaceable reformed sect with no thought of either military organization or political power. In 1577 Akbar, who liked the sikh teachings so far as he knew them, granted to the fourth Guru Ram Das the site of the tank and the Golden Temple at Amritsar and so established that town as the headquarters of the Sikh faith. The fifth Guru, Arjun, combined business with spiritual guidance, and acquired wealth from the offerings of his disciples. He was tortured and executed in 1606 by order of Jahangir, not on account of his religious teaching, but because he refused to pay the fine imposed on him for his having assisted Khusro. The Adi Granth, the original Sikh Bible, was completed in 1604 at the dictation of Guru Arjun. His son and successor Guru Hargobind, the sixth head of the sect (1606 to 1645) when presented at his installation with the turban and necklace of the predecessor refused to accept them, saying "My necklace shall be my sword-belt and my turban shall be adorned with royal aigrette". He thus began the transformation of the sect of quiet mystic into a fierce military order or brotherhood. He kept a stable of 800 horses and 300 mounted followers.

He was driven into the wild country of the Siwalike by Jahangir and after the death of the Emperor, constantly fought the officers of Shahjahan untill his death in 1645. During his period, Sikhs increased greatly in numbers and the fiscal policy of Guru Arjun and armed system of his son, formed them into kind of separate state within the Empire. He was an expert marksman. During his ministry the Sikhs made marvellous progress and multiplied in large numbers. Some historians have concocted baseless stories about his life. For instance the author of Dabistan says that the Guru was employed by Jahangir but was imprisoned at Gwalior for a period of twelve years when he appropriated to himself the pay of his soldiers and refused to pay the fine imposed on his father. This is an altogether mischievous story. Similarly the allegation that the Guru took service under Shah Jahan, but soon separated himself by raising a petty revolution is also without any foundation. He was never deflated and driven to despair. He died at Kartarpur in 1645 A.D.

The subsequent Gurus had to fight against the Mughals because their followers were being subject to tyranny and were being regarded as enemies. The Gurus were forced to change their outlook and way of working. In order to save their organisation from destruction, they had to go under the revolutionary path. They organised their followers into armed forces and emphasised upon them the need to liberate the country from slavery.

Hargobind passed over his sons and nominated his grandson Har Rai (1645-1661) as successor. He was of peaceful disposition, he had to, but for joining Dara Shukho in the war of succession, send his eldest son Ram Rai as a hostage to the Mughal court. His second son Har Krishan (1661-64) succeeded him, summoned to Delhi, he died there of smallpox, nominating Tegh Bahadur, second son of Hargobind as the ninth Guru. Very early in his career he was summoned to Delhi and put to death by Aurangzeb's order in 1675. Sikhism like Buddhism of old, like Muhammadanism in theory abolished caste. But in India in spite of all such abolitions, caste, hydra like has sprung up again and again. The mass of Indian Muhammadans are almost as caste ridden as the Hindus. This incident, however, powerfully helped the transformation of the Sikhs into a martial people. Before starting for Delhi, in answer to imperial summons, he guided upon his son, Gobind the sword of Hargobind, appointing him his successor.

Guru Gobind Singh, the tenth and the last Guru (1675-1708) awakened his followers to new life. He was the most remarkable man of his time. He established the Khalsa or the pure. The philosophical basis of religion remained unchanged. Guru Gobind Singh's military career extended over fifteen years, during which period he successfully fought against the hill Chieftains, and provincial Governors. His conquests aroused the Mughal Government to another danger. When the distressed hill chieftains applied to Aurangzeb for aid against the Guru, he dispatched a powerful army to crush the Guru. He lost his two sons but refused to yield. The Imperial Army laid siege to the fort of the Guru at Anandpur but it failed to capture him and his close associates. The Guru was able to make a break through. He continued his struggle against Aurangzeb. His letter to the Mughal Emperor is an historic document. It is called Jaffar Nama i.e. 'Tale of Victory'. In this letter he openly accused the ruler of bigotry, brutality and injustice in the name of religion and God. He told him that he would continue fighting against his mis-rule.

Guru Gobind Singh was a great patron of poets and authors. He translated a number of religious books from Sanskrit into Brij-bhasha and Punjabi. He also compiled the Granth of the Tenth Guru which is called Vichitra Natak.

After the death of Aurangzeb he spoused the cause of Bahadurshah and accompanied him to the Deccan where at Nander he was killed by a Pathan servant. The followers were henceforth to be called Singhs or Lions. The ceremony of Pahul or baptism consists essentially of drinking consecrated water stirred by sword or dagger. The commurite was specially designed to break caste. The communicants seated in a circle partake of a mixture of consecrated flour, butter and sugar, and thus set themselves free from the restrictions of the caste. Their watchword should be "Vaiguru". Guru Gobind Singh required the members of the brotherhood to adjure tobacco, which he detested. "WINE" he said is bad, Indian helm (bhang) destroyeth one generation but tobacco destroys all generations. The initiated members of the brotherhood were also commanded to wear the five 'K's, meaning five things of which Punjabi or Hindi names begin with that letter 'K' namely long hair, short drawers, an iron bangle or discus, a dagger and a comb. १

He was a great religious teacher, a military leader and a rebel, it is not easy to place his actions in due order. After a life of war with the hill rajahs of the Punjab and also with the forces of the Mughal Empire in which he lost his two sons, who were executed by the Governor of Sirhind he decided to support Shah Alam in the war of succession, proceeded with him to the South India, where he was murdered by an Afghan in 1708. He decided that Guru would henceforth be founded in Khalsa, so the personal Guruship was abolished.

Guru Gobind Singh was succeeded by his disciple, a Bairagi ascetic, who is said to be a native of Deccan, who on his master's death promptly returned to the Punjab. It was with him that Shah Alam and his officers had to do and a terrible foe they found him. The muhammadan historian says that Banda gave out that his master had been reincarnated in his body in order to take revenge on his murderer. Banda having published the statement stirred up disaffection in the sect and raised the standard of rebellion. By jugglery, charms and sorcery, he pretended to perform miracles before credulous people and gave himself the name of Sacha Padshah or the true king.

He occupied a portion of the country at the foot of the Punjab hills but was driven out of his strong hold of Lohgarh by Bahadur Shah and Munim Khan in 1710. He reappeared in Sirhind in the days of Farukh Siyar, compelled to take shelter in Gurdaspur, he was reduced by starvation to submit. He was put to death in Delhi with his followers in 1716. An active persecution was kept up against the Sikhs by the Governors of Punjab.

He took Sirhind and slew its faujdar Wazir Khan, who was responsible for the murder of Guru Gobind Singh's sons. Irvine draws a lively picture of his proceedings and the way the revenge was taken on the people of Sirhind.

"In all the parganas occupied by the Sikhs, the reversal of the previous customs was striking and complete. A low scavenger or leather-dresser, the lower of the lower in Indian estimation, had only to leave home and join the Guru when in a short time he would return to his birth place as its ruler, with his order of appointment in his hand. As soon as he set out within the boundaries, the well born and wealthy went to greet him and escort him home. Not a soul dared to disobey an order, and men, who had often risked themselves in battlefields, became so cowed that they were affraid even to remonstrate. Hindus who had not joined the sect were not exempted from those oppressions."

"The scavengers and leather-dressers and such like persons, who were very numerous amongst Sikhs, committed excesses of every discipline. For the space of four days the Sirhind was given a pillage, the mosques were defiled, houses burnt, and the Muhammadans slaughtered, even the women and children were not spared."

Not through Sikh outrages and Mahratta ravages was the rapid decay of the Empire more clearly demonstrated than by the story of the free-booter Pap Rai, a native of Warangal, in the Deccan. This Pap Rai, who was originally a toddy seller, is said to have started life by torturing and plundering his sister; little by little he got a small band around him and having made a fortress for himself on the top of a small hill began to plunder in the neighbourhood of Warangal. From small beginnings he went on increasing till he actually attacked and plundered the town of Warangal itself, then one of the most populous places in the Deccan. At last it was necessary for the Subahdar of the Deccan himself to march against him. Even then a nine months siege of his fortress was necessary before his power was brought to an end. Attempting to escape, he was wounded, captured and executed, and his limbs exposed over the gates of Hyderabad. The very fact that such a man could cause such an amount of mischief, shows that the strong hand of the Moghul was at last ceasing to operate and that Hindustan was reverting to the condition into which it had fallen after Taimur's invasion. Another few years and the anarchy will be complete. Very soon every man's hand will be against every man and the only rule recognised throughout the country will be the rule of the stronger. Shah Alam died suddenly in 1711 at Lahore. With all his faults he is the last Moghul of whom we can say anything good. After him there succeeded a series of effeminate Eastern Rulers, brought up in the Seraglio with all the vices which spring from such bringing up, and with no virtues to recommend them. The first of these, Jahandar Shah, was the son of Shah Alam. Three other brothers contended against him for the crown and his obtaining it seems to have been the result partly of the fact that one brother was drowned in the river Ravi and that another brother was accidentally shot. Zulfikar Khan, who was on his side, by his potent aid also did much towards obtaining him the crown. It was related that when this Jahandar Shah was informed of the death of his two brothers (the third one was subsequently killed) and of his having been declared Emperor, he was found in a state of intoxication. In any case his short reign, which continued a little more than a year, seems to have been one in which debauchery gained universal sway in the Emperor's Court. A Courtesan, Lal Kuar, obtained absolute ascendancy over him. Along with her he was accustomed to make expeditions into the town of Delhi and get drunk there; on one occasion he got so intoxicated that when the two were brought back to the palace in the cart in which they had been masquerading, he could not be awakened and so was left asleep at the bottom of this strange conveyance till morning. Such conduct naturally disgusted the great officers of the Court. Lal Kuar had a great friend in one Johra who, according to the authority of the Sair Mutakherin, was a seller of vegetables in the bazaar. This woman put on the airs of a great grandee and her servants, like the servants of such people when they rise in life, were wont to be most offensive towards all whom they might meet. On one occasion her retinue met those of Chin Killich Khan, whom we have already mentioned in the Deccan wars, and who was to become under the name of Nizamul Mulk the future ruler of the Deccan. They roughly ordered this general's men to get out of the way. This the general directed his men to do, but when the woman coming up on an elephant took to abusing him herself, Chin Killich Khan lost his temper and ordered his men to attack her servants. She herself was also soundly whipped by order of the irate grandee. Complaints were promptly made to the Emperor, but Zulfikar Khan who was at the time the real ruler of the State, told Jahandar Shah that any attempt to interfere with Chin Killich Khan would only lead to the Emperor's undoing. On another occasion we are told that Lal Kuar's brother was appointed by Jahandar Shah to the Subahdshipar of Agra and that Zulfikar Khan delayed drawing out the patent. The rest of the story I may tell in Khafi Khan's own words. "Zulfikar Khan was very free spoken to Jahandar Shah, and he replied: 'We courtiers have got into the bad habit of taking bribes, and we cannot do any business unless we get a bribe.' Jahandar Shah smiled, and asked what bribe he wanted from Lal Kunwar, and he said a thousand guitar-players and drawing masters (ustadi nakkashi). When the Emperor asked what he could want with them, he replied: "You give all the places and offices of us courtiers to these men, and so it has become necessary for us to learn their trade." Jahandar smiled, and the matter dropped."* Such a ruler could not possibly reign long. There have been rulers as great debauchees in India as this young ruler, but hardly one whose debaucheries were so patent to the outside world.

At this time Farokh Siar, the grandson of Bahadur Shah, was the nominal ruler of Bengal. Jahandar Shah on his succession had sent to Jafar Khan; who was the real ruler of that province, to send the young man prisoner to Court. Jafar Khan had more than half made up his mind to comply when he found that Farokh Siar's cause was espoused by Husain Ali Khan, the Governor of Patna. This man was one of the Sayids of Barah and he and his brother Abdullah Khan were two of the most powerful nobles of Hindustan at the time. The second brother commanded at Allahabad. An army was got together under these two Sayids which rapidly marched up to the valley of the Ganges. Of fighting there was but little. Both Jahandar Shah and his son who was defeated before him seem to have been cowards; at any rate, they were not fit to lead an army of any size and their supporters seem to have been but halfhearted in their support. After the last defeat Jahandar Shah fled to Agra and there went to interview Asad Khan, Zulfikar Khan's father, who was still the nominal Wazir of the Empire. Father and son differed in opinion; the son who did not expect any favour from Farokh Siar suggested that war should still be carried on. The father, on the other hand, thought that the correct course would be to hand over the incapable young man to Farokh Siar who had by this time been placed on the royal throne. They received from that Emperor through his chief favourite Amir Jamla promises of protection, but these were only made to be broken. On leaving the royal presence after his first interview Zulfikar Khan was brutally murdered, the father Asad Khan was seized, imprisoned and deprived of all his properties. The place of these two, who had for so long had the greatest influence in the Empire, was taken by the two Sayids. This turned out to be the ruin of Farokh Siar, for he himself, in spite of all what they had done for him, never trusted them. On the other hand, he gave himself over to favourities such as Amir Jamla, men with but little capacity of any sort, but full of cunning and cruelty, and the consequence was that the whole of this reign was one long series of assassinations and judicial murders and that finally the Emperor himself came to an untimely end.

---

* Elliot. Vol. VII, p. 433.

“Farokh Siar had no will of his own. He was young, inexperienced in business, and inattentive to affairs of State. He had grown up in Bengal, far away from his grandfather and father. He was entirely dependent on the opinions of others, for he had no resolution or discretion. By the help of fortune he had seized the crown. The timidity of his character contrasted with the vigour of the race of Timur, and he was not cautious in listening to the words of artful men. From the beginning of his reign he himself brought his troubles on himself.” On the one hand were the Sayids really powerful nobles and in their own way statesmen, men who had made Farokh Siar King, with the full support of most of the leading men at the Court at the time; on the other Amir Jamla and a band of parasites, without any real backing, save the Emperor’s favour, but interfering and intriguing to the last degree. No reign consequently could have opened more unpropitiously.

Syed Abdullah Khan became Wazir, Husain Ali Khan for some time held no settled office, but was eventually appointed as Subahdar of the Deccan. These two Sayids were at the head of what might be called the Hindustani faction as against the foreign or Turan Nobles, as these were called from the word Turan so often used in Oriental literature as opposed to Iran and meaning the North of the Oxus, of which Nizamul Mulk was the chief. The appointment of Husain Ali Khan to the Subahdarship of the Deccan was a direct insult to Nizamul Mulk inasmuch as he at the time held this post, and had for a very considerable time been considered the chief authority there. The rivalry between these two eventually led to the overthrow of the Syeds, but of this more hereafter.

In the first years of Farokh Siar's reign the most important events were (omitting the Mahratta affairs concerning which I shall deal hereafter and the quarrels between the various factions of the Court) the ineffectual invasion of Rajputana ending in a fresh treaty with Raja Ajit Singh, religious troubles in the various parts of the Kingdom and the seemingly final suppression of the Sikhs. As regards the first, nothing special need be said. It was the old story of the devastation of the plain country and the retreating of the Rajputs to the hills, of ineffectual attempts of the heavy laden Moghuls to follow them and of an eventual suspension of hostilities, leaving things much as they were.

Religious disturbances were two-fold amongst the Muhammedan community, amongst themselves first of all, and then between them and the Hindus. There is nearly always a latent feeling of hostility between the Shiahs and Sunnis which only needs a convenient occasion for it to burst into flame. The Muhammedan community at that time as a body looked down upon the Hindus, considering them as good servants but as not having a right to aspire to be anything more. It was from this fanciful Muhammedan superiority that the progress of the Mahratta power was so rough an awakening. Inside the territories, which were not only in name but in reality Moghul, the rulers ordinarily attempted to protect their Hindu subjects. If the latter were to be fleeced, it was to be for the benefit of themselves personally or for the State; but the Muhammedan community at large could only be induced by a strong hand to look on matters in such a light. A great outburst happened in 1713 at Ahmedabad when the Hindu "Holi" was in progress. This festival which comes about the time of the Vernal Equinox, a time of year which gives rise to festivals in all parts of the world, is always accompanied with intoxication and a great deal of indecency. The essential, however, is the burning of the "holi" at various places particularly at cross roads. A dispute between the Muhammedans and Hindus as to this burning gave rise in Ahmedabad to the wildest riots. The Muhammedan rulers there were in favour of the Hindus and to have given permission to a particular Hindu to burn the "holi" in front of his house. The reason of this decision was that the Muhammedan ruler held that every man was master of his own house and entitled to do what he liked therein. A Muhammedan residing near a Hindu promptly retaliated by killing a cow in front of his own house in full view of the Hindus. These latter assembled, drove their Muhammedan neighbours into their houses, slew the son of the man who had sacrificed the animal and a number of others. This naturally excited the Muhammedans who in their turn executed reprisals, and for days confusion reigned unchecked in the city. The Government officials, though Muhammedans themselves, suffered badly at their co-religionists' hands. The Muhammedan community seems to have had considerable grounds for complaint and it sent two or three of their number to Delhi to complain, but on reaching the capital they were promptly thrown into prison, the Hindus having managed to bribe the Imperial officials, the Empire already being in a state when everything was to be purchased.

Some years later much more serious disturbances broke out in Kashmir. These originated in an agitation raised by a turbulent fanatic named Mahbub Khan. Along with a number of his co-religionists he went to the Kazi and the Deputy Subahdar and demanded that no Hindu should be allowed to ride on a horse, or to wear a coat, or to put on a turban or wear it or go out on excursions to a field or garden or bathe on certain days. In support of this demand he quoted certain legal opinions (Futwaha). Muhammedan Doctors have given a variety of Futwaha on the most various subjects, and it was easy for Mahbub Khan to extract from them a Fatwah concerning Kafirs which would make practically slaves of them, but such decisions, save on the rare occasions that they have been put in force for some political purpose, have never had any practical effect in any Muhammedan State. The Moghul Emperors, who had for their subjects more Hindus than Muhammedans, had been guided by certain rules concerning the treatment of the former and these rules governed the Empire and not the Futwaha of any obscure Muhammedan Lawyer: it was to this effect that the Kazi and Subahdar Deputy answered Mahbub Khan. The latter, however, raised the cry of religion, and pronounced openly that he was going to teach the Hindus their proper place. Matters came to a head when he attacked a respectable Hindu, who was feasting a large number of Brahmins in one of his own gardens, and killed a number of people there. The rioters then proceeded to attack the Government officials, who, they considered, had been too partial towards the Hindus. Mir Ahmed Khan the ruler at the time got together a force, but was unable to drive the rebels out of the streets in Srinagar where they were collected. "The rioters set fire to both sides of the street through which they had passed, and from in front and from the roofs and walls of the houses they discharged arrows and muskets and cast stones and bricks. Women and children flung filth, dirt and whatever they could lay hands on." A fierce fight continued, in which a number were killed, and the Governor was obliged to ask for mercy, and allowed to escape amidst the jeers and insults of the victorious rioters. For months Mahbub Khan acted as the ruler of Kashmir. Under his rule Hindus were killed and many others maltreated. It was only after the death of Farokh Siar that news was received that a new Governor had been sent to Kashmir. Thereupon Mahbub Khan, on finding resistance unavailing, made his submission personally to one of the former officials, the Bakshi (Treasurer). As he was leaving this man's premises he was assassinated together with his two young sons. It is said to have been done by the Shiahhs, for they as well as the Hindus had been outraged by his conduct. Further rioting between the Sunnis and Shiahhs accompanied by much bloodshed naturally followed. It was only brought to an end by the arrival of the new Governor from Delhi, who by severe measures succeeded in a short time in restoring order.

The Sikhs, after their dispersion at Lobgarh and their retreat to the inner Himalayas, taking advantage of the troublous times that followed the death of Shah Alam, again became troublesome, making their head-quarters the fort of Gurdaspur in the Punjab. From this place they ravaged the whole of the Western part of that province. Dilir Jung, the Subahdar of Lahore, with great exertions got together a force to march against them and after much fighting drove them into this fort of theirs. It is said that when hard pressed they offered to surrender on condition of their lives being spared, and that as to this Dilir Jung advised them to beg pardon of their crime and of their offences to the Emperor; but whatever he promised, the capitulation of the fort was followed by the most terrible butchery. Thousands were slain on the spot; two thousand heads of Sikhs stuffed with hay were sent by the successful General to Delhi to show that his victory had been a reality. Along with these heads went a thousand prisoners amongst whom was Banda, his son of 7 to 8 years old and his Diwan. On their arrival at Delhi the prisoners had their faces blackened and wooden caps put on their heads. Then they were paraded on camels through the city, with the stuffed heads accompanying them, and so they were marched before the Emperor. After this the whole of them were put to death in batches in the bazar. Last of all Banda himself was put to death after he had been forced to kill his own son. Stories are told of the devotedness of these men and how great was their devotion to their Guru. One of these is told by Khafi Khan in the following language. "When the executions were going on, the mother of one of the prisoners, a young man just arrived at manhood having obtained some influential support, pleaded the cause of her son with great feeling and earnestness before the Emperor and Sayad Abdullah Khan. She represented that her son had suffered imprisonment and hardships at the hands of the sect. His property was plundered, and he was made prisoner. While in captivity, he was, without any fault of his own, introduced into the sect, and now stood innocent amongst those sentenced to death. Furakh Siar commiserated this artful woman, and mercifully sent an officer with orders to release the youth. That cunning woman arrived with the order of release just as the executioner was standing with his bloody sword upheld over the young man's head. She showed the order for his release. The youth then broke out into complaints, saying, "My mother tells a falsehood; I with heart and soul join my fellow-believers in devotion to the Guru; send me quickly after my companions."*

The sect was now seemingly at an end; the organisation was broken up, their chiefs were killed, or in exile and it seemed that the Sikh heresy, as the Hindus would call it, would be known simply as one of the many heresies which for many centuries have ruffled the surface of the Hindu religion and then disappeared. But the subsequent anarchy to which the Punjab was reduced and the virility of the race which had adopted Sikhism as their faith, prevented this from happening and after a very few years it again showed itself in great strength; every day increasing and increasing, until towards the end of the century a Sikh Chieftain became the ruler of the Punjab and established a power there, which became the most formidable adversary which the British has ever had to meet in Hindustan.

We now return from the outskirts of the Empire to Delhi itself. The two Sayads, as I have already said, were all powerful and the great offices of the Empire were concentrated in them. They had placed Furukh Siar on the throne and could, so everybody at the time was aware, if they so wished, set aside their puppet. But Furukh Siar, although a puppet, had no desire to be so, and Court favourites, of whom Mir Jumla was the chief, were ever urging on him to get rid of the two powerful Sayads. Nor were Court favourites the only persons who were dissatisfied with the rule of these nobles. I have already mentioned that Nizam-ul-Mulk, the Chief Turanian noble at the time, had been grossly insulted by the younger Sayad's appointment as Subahdar of the Daccan and, Nizam-ul-Mulk, although the chief, was only one of his class. The foreign nobles generally were not pleased with having the two Sayads of Barah, men, who although they were descendants of the Prophet, had ancestors who for quite a number of generations had resided in India, as the all-powerful authorities in the State, and so all the elements of discord were present.

The Sayads were determined not to permit the Court favourites to become too strong and so they forced Furukh Siar to send away Mir Jumla to Patna. Husain Ali Khan was at the time bound for the Deccan, but he is recorded before his departure to have addressed the Emperor in the following fashion;—

“ If in my absence you recall Mir Jumla to your presence, or if my brother, Kutb-ul-Mulk, Sayad Abdullah, again receive similar treatment, you may rely upon my being here from the Dakhin in the course of twenty days.”*

Further stipulations which he made, gave to him the sole power of appointing Commandants to the forts. Nizam-ul-Mulk was not inclined to give up the Deccan without a struggle, but he did not think it prudent to show his hand openly and so stirred up Daud Khan Pani, the Subahdar of Ahmednuggur, to oppose Husain Ali Khan. This Daud Khan, a typical fighting Afghan, acting probably not only on the suggestions of Nizam-ul-Mulk but on confidential requests from the Emperor, openly resisted Husain Ali Khan. The consequence was a pitched battle near Berhampur in which Daud Khan with a much smaller force of Afghans fought with desperate courage against Husain Ali Khan's troops. Daud Khan was, however, a swordsman rather than a General, and after showing great personal prowess was killed by a stray cannon ball.

About this time died Asad Khan, the father of Zulfikar Khan, who had been so brutally murdered. Furukh Siar is said to have sent him a message in the days of his last illness to the following effect :

“ We did not know your worth, and have done what we ought not to have done to such a valuable servant of the State, but repentance is of no avail ; still we hope you will give us your advice about the way to treat the Sayads.”†

* Elliot, Vol. VII, pp. 149-450.

† Elliot, Vol. VII p. 461.

To this the old man is said to have replied as follows :

“ The fault which you committed, contrary to the practice of your ancestors, proceeded only from the will of God. I knew that, when the office of minister went out of my family, ruin threatened the House of Timur. But as you have placed yourself and the reins of power in the hands of the Sayads of Barah, the best thing for the State is, that you should, to the best of your ability, deal kindly with them, and not carry matters to such a pitch that strife and discord should increase, and you should lose all power.”*

Affairs ever grew worse between the Sayads and the Emperor. Husain Ali Khan spent most of his time in 1717 and 1718 in the Deccan ; at one time fighting with the Mahrattas and at another entering into negotiations with them. Abdullah Khan, on the other hand, spent his time, when he did not give himself over to pleasure, for he was a licentious man, in quarrelling with the various officials of the Court and the Emperor himself. At one time matters got so bad, that for months no papers whatsoever were signed by him, although he being Wazir, his signature was necessary for the current work of the realm. Husain Ali Khan finally entered into a treaty of peace with the Mahrattas, the details of which I shall write about hereafter, but which was considered by the Imperial Court as highly derogatory to the Moghuls. The Emperor at last made a serious attempt to get rid of the Sayads' control. Inspired by a Court-favourite, described as a Kashmiri of low origin, and who is said to have been, according to the scandal of the time, the Minister of the Emperor's not over-reputable pleasures, Furukh Siar called in Sir Buland Khan, the Governor of Patna, Nizam-ul-Mulk, who had been given a comparatively small appointment at Moradabad, a town in what is now known as Rohilkund, and Raja Ajit Singh, the Rajput, to the capital, and proposed to them to put an end to the Barah nobles' supremacy ; but as his first suggestion was that the Kashmiri should be made Wazir in the place of Sayad Abdullah Khan, these great noblemen did not show any great desire to enter into the Emperor's plans. Husain Ali Khan in the Deccan, however, had heard of them and so set his army on march to the Court. In this march he was accompanied by a force of Mahratta auxiliaries. Fort after fort he occupied on his way without opposition, Nizam-ul-Mulk had already left Delhi in disgust and gone to Moradabad. Sir Buland Khan who had put himself to great expense and who was finding no means of recouping himself, is said to have determined to become a religious fakir, but in any case his hostilities were disarmed by the Sayad Wazir, who appointed him to the Subahdarship of Cabul. Raja Ajit Singh, the third of the great men upon whom the Emperor relied, became reconciled to the Minister, and so when Husain Ali Khan reached Delhi, there was not one of the great nobles or Generals of the Empire that in any way opposed him. That Husain Ali Khan had come with the intention to dethrone Furukh Siar, was evident from his having ordered his drums to be beaten loudly on his approach to Delhi, for, according to the law of the Moghuls, no drums were ever allowed to be beaten near the residence of the Emperor. Furukh Siar's conduct was what might have been expected. "But the strangest thing was that the heedless Emperor—although he heard the sounds of the hostile drums and trumpets, which rose so boldly—and publicly—and although at the sound of the drum other drums in every street and market beat to arms—even then he did not come to his senses. All resolution and prudence was cast aside. Now raging with anger, he rolled up his sleeves (for action) threatening vengeance against the two brothers; now taking a conciliatory turn, he sat behind the curtain of dissimulation and opened the door of amity upon the face of enmity."*

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 461.

Such conduct could have only one termination. Husain Ali entered into the fort and the reign of Furukh Siar was over. The night which ensued was one of dread and confusion throughout the city, but all the same there was but little rioting, and when next morning Rafi-ud-Darjah, a youthful descendant of Aurangzeb, was put on the throne, the town settled down again to its ordinary avocations. This happened in A. D. 1719. Whether Furukh Siar was put to death at once, or whether he met his end a little time afterwards is not certain. In any case there was with him but one step from the throne to the grave. He was never seen outside of his prison house again. The newly proclaimed Emperor died after a reign of six months. After him another puppet, also a descendant of Aurangzeb, named Rafi-ud-Doulah, succeeded but he too died after a reign of three months. During the reign of these two young men the rulers of the country were the Sayads, though everywhere the local Governors had begun to take all the real power in their hands. Another youthful puppet followed, also descended from Aurangzeb, named Muhammad Shah. His reign, unlike theirs, was prolonged for 29 years, but its records are one long story of ever-increasing disintegration, till at last on the sack of Delhi by the Persian Conqueror, Nadir Shah, in 1739, the Empire itself as a governing institution may be said to have come to an end.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 474.

The first year of Muhammad Shah's reign was the last of the rule of the Sayads. The Turanian nobles everywhere were disaffected and the chief of them, Nizam-ul-Mulk, broke out into open revolt. The first matter which called the attention of the Sayads, however, was not to put down the Muhammedan revolt but the subjection of a Hindu nobleman. Chabila Ram, a Hindu of distinction, was Governor at Allahabad at the time of the accession of the new Prince. His attitude was such that immediate preparations had to be made to proceed against him, but before the expedition started he was dead. His brother's son Girdhar Bahadur, however, seized the vacant Governorship and declined to submit the fort to the Sayads although they made great promises. Husain Ali Khan was in command of the besieging army. The other brother, Sayad Abdullah, accompanied by the Emperor had at first been in the besieging camp, but on Girdhar Bahadur promising to surrender, this Sayad and the Emperor left and started on their way to Delhi. On hearing, however, that the promise had not been kept, they returned back. Finally Ratan Chand Dewan and the Sayads met Girdhar and settled an arrangement, the same being confirmed by an oath on Ganges water. The result of this was that the Imperialists obtained possession of Allahabad. But in the meantime their attention was called to the movements of Nizam-ul-Mulk. This crafty and experienced nobleman had been sent away from Delhi at the beginning of Rafi-ud-Darjah's reign to Malwa, of which place he had been appointed Subahdar. While there, he got messages both from the Emperor and the Emperor's mother that the Sayads were bent upon destroying him. Abiding his time, he got large reinforcements from the Deccan, where he had been employed for a number of years, and at last considered himself strong enough to march to Delhi. Burhanpur fell into his hands without a struggle. Moving slowly towards the North and West he defeated Dilawar Ali Khan, the General of the Sayads, in May 1720, a few miles from Ratanpur. Shortly afterwards he also defeated Alam Khan, the adopted son of Husain Ali Khan, who had been appointed in succession to him as Viceroy of the Deccan by the Sayads.

This news caused great consternation at Delhi; there the Sayads had alienated not only the Moghuls, but a great number of Native Muhammedan noblemen by the great favour they had shown to the Hindus, and particularly to Ratan Chand who virtually under them governed the kingdom. The state of feeling in that city is graphically described by Khafi Khan.

“ There were a number of persons, old servants, attendants and officials of the two brothers, especially of Sayad Abdullah, who through them had risen to great honour and prosperity. But the infamous murder of the martyr Emperor (Furukh Siar), the sight of the indignities which the Emperor, the representative of the House of Timur, had to endure, and the fact of the administration being under the direction of a base-born shop-keeper (Ratan Chand) had, under the guidance of the converter of Hearts, so changed their feelings, that some of them often said, ‘ Although we know that we shall suffer many hardships through the downfall of the Barahs, still we hope that, through the blindness of its ill-wishers, the House of Timur may again acquire splendour'. Some of the relations and officials of the two brothers often offered up their prayers to God, and said, 'The end of the lives of the two brothers, who have no children, is evident; but woe to all Barah Sayads, for we know what evil awaits our children through the misdeeds of these two men.'**

The two brothers determined between themselves that Husain Ali should march against Nizam-ul-Mulk taking the Emperor with him, while Sayad Abdullah should remain at Delhi. The Imperial Army had not, however, got much beyond Agra, when the Sayad brother accompanying it was assassinated by Mir Hyder Khan, an Afghan. Great confusion followed; partizans of the Sayads attempted to seize the Emperor, but the rival faction in the camp proved to be too strong for them and the Emperor found himself freed from the control of his two powerful protectors. On this news reaching Delhi, Sayad Abdullah put another scion of the House of Timur on the throne as Emperor, getting together a fresh army to which the Jats contributed a very large number. This army set out very slowly to meet the Emperor's force which were mainly the troops of Husain Ali. It is mentioned by the historian that this newly got up army seems to have been altogether without discipline.

"Notwithstanding all the lavish distribution of the money which had been collected by cartfuls from house to house, and which had been extorted by bribery or with violence by Ratan Chand from the wretched rayats, and laid up for a time like this, the old soldiers wanted two months' pay in advance, that they might free themselves from their liabilities to the bankers, and provide themselves with warm clothing, arms and harness. They were satisfied with the promise of one month's pay, and at last money for the pay of ten days of Mohurram was somehow raised, but they could not get the balance."†

The leaders of the royal army, on the other hand, had won the hearts of the soldiers by promising them their arrears of pay. The battle which followed was fought at Husainpur, a place between Agra and Delhi. According to our Chronicler, Sayad Abdullah's troops fought magnificently—only the royal army fought better. However, this may be, the battle was not settled on the first day; on the second, when the Imperialists attacked Sayad Abdullah, he was foolish enough to dismount from his elephant. The consequence was a dispersal of his army and his being taken prisoner. The puppet of an Emperor set up by him was pardoned, a rare thing in those days. Sayad Abdullah's captivity did not last long: he died in 1722, probably poisoned, and Nizam-ul-Mulk who had not been present at the decisive battle but who arrived some time afterwards at Delhi, received the appointment of Wazir of the Empire.

---

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 501.

† Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 511.

We now get to the last chapter of the history of the Empire before complete anarchy set in; but before proceeding further it is necessary that we should hark back and tell what the Mahrattas had been doing during the troublesome years between the death of Aurangzeb and the point at which I have now arrived.

I have already stated that when Azam Shah set out on his march to Agra in order to contest the possession of the Imperial throne with his elder brother Bahadur Shah, he set at liberty Sahoo, the son of Sambhuji, who for many years had been kept by Aurangzeb as a prisoner about his Court. At this time Tarabai, the widow of Ram Raja, the younger brother of Sambhuji and accordingly grandson of Sivaji, was the nominal head of the Mahratta power; she being a woman of much ambition was not at all disposed to yield to Sahoo without a struggle. In this she was encouraged by the leading Mahrattas at her Court, whose ambition was more effectually served by service under a woman than it would have been by obedience to a man. Sahoo accordingly did not obtain possession of the headship of the Mahratta race without a struggle, and even when he did take possession of Sattara, the capital of the Mahratta lands, Tarabai and afterwards one of her sons (he was at this time very young) continued to hold a rival court at Kolapur. Sahoo himself had, during the many years that he had been in the Imperial Court, lost much of the virility and activity which characterised a Mahratta, and as a consequence, although he obtained the titular headship of the race, the real power departed elsewhere, largely into the hands of his Brahmin Ministers, but also in part to the leading generals some of whom, such as Scindia, Holkar and the Gaekwar founded dynasties which have survived to the present day. Of these Nimaji Scindia was the most considerable. Like Guru Govind of the Sikhs, he found it to suit his interest to take the part of Shah Alam and in the decisive battle against Kaum Buksh was to be found fighting on the Imperial side. An extraordinary story is told as to the origin of another of the great Mahratta families which in the days of the anarchy exercised so great an influence in Central India. Sahoo had to storm a small village, the people of which had taken the side of Tarabai. During the fight a woman with a boy in her arms rushed towards the Mahratta Chief, threw the child down, and shouted that she devoted the child to the Raja's service. Sahoo accepted the child, named the lad Fateh Singh and treated him as his own son. This Fateh Singh was the founder of the Bhonsla family which reigned up till 1852 A. D. in Nagpore.

It was in these contests between Sahoo and Tarabai that Poona became the real head-quarters of the Mahratta power. The Governor of Poona, known as the Suchew, was the partizan of Tarabai and held the place nominally for her. Sahoo moved to attack him in A. D. 1711, but before the two parties joined issue the Suchew committed suicide by a process known as the Jalsamad (voluntary death by water). "It is effected by placing a wooden platform upon severel earthen pots, with their mouths turned down, to which planks are fastened, and small holes are bored in the earthen vessels; the whole is placed in deepwater, on some river accounted holy, and the devotee seats or ties himself on the platform, which gradually sinks with him."*

Balaji Vishvanath was a Brahmin, and he and his descendants were known as the Mahratta Peshwas; within a very few years they became the acknowledged heads of the Mahratta confederacy and Poona originally Balaji's appanage, became the capital of the race. Tarabai's son died of smallpox in 1712. Consequently the son of Tarabai's co-wife was put on the Kolapur guddi. The Brahmin Ministers carried on the administration as before, but Tarabai was confined and lost all influence in the Kolapur State. While Zulfikar Khan was the Governor of the Deccan, he managed by judicious arrangements and by allowing the Mahrattas to collect a certain amount of chouth to keep the country more or less quiet. On the death of Shah Bahadur and on the cessation of Zulfikar's power in the Deccan, things again reverted to their former condition. Everywhere the Mahrattas were to be found robbing and plundering, sometimes under the pretence of collecting the legitimate dues of the Mahratta ruler, and at other times without any pretence at all. Nizam-ul-Mulk, who succeeded Zulfikar Khan as the Moghul ruler of the Deccan for a short time, favoured the Kolapur regency all along, and by his influence that power gained considerable ground. On the other hand, by this time Balaji Vishvanath had made his influence felt in support of Sahoo, and as he was a man of much energy and vigour, the Sattara State still remained the stronger. When Nizam-ul-Mulk was withdrawn from the Deccan and one of the Sayad brothers was appointed Subahdar in his place, the Kolapur power became almost a negligible quantity. This was in no way due to Sahoo himself. His character is thus described by Grant Duff. "Sahoo was not destitute of ordinary ability, he was naturally generous, liberal to all religious establishments, observant of forms enjoined by the Hindu faith, and particularly charitable to Brahmins. The Ghaut Mahta and the rugged Concan were his birthright, but unused to climb Ghauts, or wander and live in the wilds of the mountain-forest, like his hardy grandfather, Sahoo's childhood was spent within the enclosure of the imperial seraglio, and it is not surprising, that seduced by the pomp and luxury of which he partook, his habits should continue those of a Muhammedan. He occasionally showed all the violence of the Mahratta character, and for the time, anger overcame his indolence, but in general he was satisfied with the respect and homage paid to his person, and the professions of obedience invariably shown by the ministers to his commands; he was pleased at being freed from the drudgery of business, and in following his favourite amusements of hawking, hunting, and fishing; he did not foresee that he was delegating a power, which might supersede his own. As legitimate head of the Mahrattas, the importance of that nation was increased by the manner in which he was courted by the Moghuls, and the dignities and rights conferred upon him in consequence of his situation, gave an influence and respect to the name of Sahoo, which, under other circumstances, he could never have attained. Both the sons of Sivaji followed the example of their father, from the period when he mounted the throne, and always declared their independence; but Sahoo acknowledged himself a vassal of the throne of Delhi, and whilst styling himself King of the Hindus he affected, in his transactions with the Moghuls, to consider himself merely as a Zamindar, or Head Deshmukh of the Empire.* Husain Ali Khan, the Sayad successor of Nizam-ul-Mulk, pressed as he was by the Court rivalries which threatened to deprive him of his power, found it necessary to come to terms with the Mahrattas. His treaty with them, which he negotiated through Balaji Vishvanath, although not ratified at the time by the Delhi Court, may be considered as a turning point in the history of the Deccan. By it certain territories known as Swuraji was granted to Sahoo and his successors in territorial sovereignty, only the suzerainty of the Moghul Empire being preserved. This territory consisted of the greater part of what is known as the Mahratta country. Outside of this the Mahrattas were granted chouth (one-fourth of the revenue) in the six Moghul Subahs of the Deccan—the condition being simply the maintenance of 15,000 horse for the purpose of assisting the military Governors in preserving tranquillity. A further grant of Sur-desh-mukhi or 10 per cent. of the revenue of the Deccan was granted also in perpetuity to the Mahratta rulers, for what services, it is not very clear, though presumably it was for help to the Moghul Governors. As to this, the Mahratta treasury had to pay down in advance a fee of 6½ years income as Peshkush. All throughout India wherever long leases are given or grants of a similar nature are made, it is customary to take besides the reserved rent a very considerable amount of money in advance as a premium under different names such as Salami or Peshkush. Sur-desh-mukhi was not in terms a hereditary grant but as the fee was charged as if it were, the Mahrattas had substantial reasons for claiming it to be such. Besides these rights they also claimed some rights of tribute over both Gujarat and Malwa, but these were never reduced to writing, and probably only existed in the Mahratta Statesmen's desires. This treaty, as I have said, was originally made by Sayad Husain Ali and was not confirmed at the time by the Imperial Court, but Balaji Vishvanath accompanied this Sayad on his march to Delhi which terminated in Furukh Siar's deposition and in the earliest days of Muhammad Shah's rule this arrangement was confirmed. Balaji Vishvanath died almost immediately afterwards in A. D. 1720. The consequence of this agreement was twofold. First of all, the Mahratta power thereby became supreme South of the Vindhya Mountains, and the Moghul power throughout the greater part of Southern India became reduced to more or less of a shadow. Secondly, with the rule of the Mahratta, came the rule of unlimited license. No man in Southern India knew how far his property was safe and to what exactions he might have to submit or how much he might have to pay. During the Moghul sovereignty, law in theory at least ruled everywhere, and in spite of the numerous local exactions, the Moghul subject ordinarily was only taxed within certain limits recognised by the law. One may say indeed, that in spite of all its defects, the Moghul rule was the rule of law. But with the Mahrattas all this finished. Law no more had any say. Hosts of tax gatherers, each of them a law to himself, took the place of the ordinary tax collector of the Moghuls. The consequences were inevitable. Within a very few years the countries which were overrun by the Mahrattas fell into a state of destitution and ruin; and though the governing power at Poona tried its best to collect within its own treasury the greater part of the moneys extorted from the miserable inhabitants of the countries in which these taxes were collected, these attempts had but very partial success. Everywhere military chiefs collected on their own account, and it must be remembered that besides the great chiefs there were a large number of petty military bands amenable to no one which did only what seemed best in the eyes of the petty chiefs who commanded them.

---

* Duff, Vol. I, p. 421.

---

* Duff, Vol. I, p. 440.

Nizam-ul-Mulk did not stay long at Court. When he arrived there, he found matters in a great state of disorder; the Imperial authority had been slighted at Ajmere by the Rajput Governor and although preparations had been taken to punish this man, yet owing to quarrels between the chief noblemen at Court, nothing had been done and the matter had been seemingly passed over. Similar news came from other parts of the Empire, besides incessant stories of wrongs committed by the Mahrattas in the Deccan. Nizam-ul-Mulk seemed to have had hopes of doing something to remedy this state of affairs; in order to do which a reform in the Court itself would have been an absolutely necessary antecedent. Accordingly he gave advice to the Emperor how he should behave in public and in private; how he should assume, when abroad, an air of gravity and seriousness, and should set apart certain hours every day for public business and in particular for rendering justice. He also advised him to reform his Court by preventing his favourites (women particularly) from being supreme there. The Emperor, however, was young, loved pleasure and had many advisers at hand both amongst the Delhi noblemen and amongst the women of the Seraglio, who everywhere obstructed Nizam-ul-Mulk. In particular Khan Dauran, who had the chief power at Court before the arrival of Nizam-ul-Mulk, was desirous to get rid of the latter, who, he thought, was an obstacle in his way; so did also a woman Poki Padshah, one of the Emperor's Harem favourites, who used all her influence with him to prevent Nizam-ul-Mulk's advice from bearing any weight. The new Wazir himself (Nizam-ul-Mulk) was not perhaps the best person to reform a Court such as Delhi had become, he being old, reserved in manners and inclined to stop all amusements whatsoever. As regards specific points, Khafi Khan tells us that Nizam-ul-Mulk advised the Emperor that the system of farming the Khalisa lands ought to be stopped; secondly, that the bribes which were received under the name of Peshkush by the Emperor and his chief noblemen injured his good name and were contrary to good policy, and thirdly, that the Jizya should be reimposed. It is also stated that he advised the Emperor to help Persia in its struggle against the Afghans who at the time were conquering that country. As regards this last point, however, this may be taken as only a counsel of perfection. The Moghul Emperor had too much to do to maintain a resemblance of power over a large part of the Southern dominions to attempt any external conquests. As regards the third point, it will be seen that Nizam-ul-Mulk wished to revive Aurangzeb's system, which would have only brought the inevitable end of the Moghul power sooner, but as regards the first two points if the Emperor had listened to him, much might have been gained. An honest administration by public servants of the Khalisa lands would probably have made the dwellers in them at least fairly contented, and enabled these lands to provide a certain number of competent soldiers to fight for the Empire. Letting such lands to farmers meant that the cultivators in them would be fleeced of everything that they had and that the lands themselves would quickly go out of cultivation. Farming in India is commonly only too prevalent. Every one in the country does it from the Government down to the very small lessee of a very small landlord and perhaps it cannot be prevented. At all times, however, its evils are obvious, and in a time such as that of which we are now writing, especially in the case of these Khalisa lands, large in area as they were, the result was inevitably disastrous. As regards the taking of Peshkush, gifts have always been, in the East, made to the rulers; generally the lower an Empire has sunk, the larger has been the amount of such gifts. It was idle of Nizam-ul-Mulk to wish that these should be abandoned, especially at such a time when probably it was through them that the Emperor and his chief courtiers chiefly got their ready cash. Anyhow, the Wazir, although given a new title of Wakil Mutalik (supreme Lieutenant-General), felt this journey to Delhi to be a failure. Asking leave that he might go out hunting, he set off to the Deccan where he stayed looking after this Subah of which he was Viceroy together with the other neighbouring governments, which he held from time to time. There he remained till shortly before the time that Nadir Shah invaded India, and the history of the Deccan and really of India for the next few years is that of his intrigues, contests and agreement with the Mahratta Generals and rulers. He was not allowed, however, to get back to the Deccan without obstruction. Letters were sent privately from Delhi to the Military Governor at Burhanpur, requesting him to attack the returning Viceroy and promising him in case of success the reversion of the Viceroyalty. A battle ensued between the two in which the Burhanpur Governor was killed and Nizam-ul-Mulk ironically wrote to the Emperor stating that this Governor had rebelled and that he had chastised and killed him. He also sent the usual present sent by victorious Generals to the Emperor under such circumstances; along with this he also sent the Governor's head.

Nizam-ul-Mulk's chief opponent was Baji Rao, the new Peshwa. This man was as capable as his father and being able to act on a wider scale, made for himself a great career during the first twenty years of Muhammad Shah's reign. It was he, more than any one else, who induced the Mahrattas to invade Hindustan and to reduce it to the same state of anarchy and suffering as that into which the Deccan had, by reason of incessant Mahratta raids, already fallen. He did not, however, succeed in inducing Sahoo and the other chiefs to accept this policy without opposition. In Council fears were expressed lest such a plan should be too great for the Mahratta strength, and should bring against them the whole strength of the Empire including that of Nizam-ul-Mulk who, in case the Mahratta forces were largely engaged in the North, would probably take the occasion to attack their earlier conquests in the South. But Baji Rao was more than a match for his opponents. He had the rare faculty of being able to read the signs of the times, and to one who had such a faculty it was obvious that the Moghul Empire, although still nominally as large as in the days of its glory, was really on the high way to dissolution. As a matter of policy he also saw that the Deccan being already a devastated country it was necessary to keep the numerous Mahratta bodies of horse engaged by employing them on excursions in the field. One of the discussions is reported thus: " ' Now is our time,' said this gallant Peshwa, ' to drive strangers from the land of Hindus, and to acquire immortal renown. By directing our efforts to Hindustan, the Mahratta flag in your reign shall fly from the Kistna to the Attock.' ' You shall plant it on the Himalaya,' exclaimed the Raja, ' you are indeed a noble son of a worthy father.' Baji Rao improved the opportunity by urging Sahoo not to think of minor objects, and alluding to the Moghul Empire, ' let us strike,' said he, ' at the trunk of the withering tree, the branches must fall of themselves.' "*

At the time of Nizam-ul-Mulk's return to the Deccan, Hamid Khan, his uncle, was Governor of Gujarat, but before the former got back to his government Sir Buland Khan was sent from Cabul to supersede the latter. An appointment by the Court of the Governorship of one of the outlying provinces had come by this time to mean but little, the Governor so appointed having to take possession of his appointment and this generally meant fighting. Hamid Khan was not in a humour to submit without a struggle. Aided by the Mahrattas he attacked Sir Buland Khan, but although he obtained a signal victory at the start, he was unable to maintain himself in his position, and Sir Buland Khan managed to capture Ahmedabad the capital and to maintain himself there for a time. But he had never been in high favour of the Court and so within about three years the Rajput Raja Abi Singh was sent to supersede him. This Raja first of all tried to take possession of the province by means of a Deputy, but the latter was defeated and driven away by Sir Buland Khan. Then he arrived himself, and after an indecisive battle Sir Buland Khan entered his camp alone, reminded him that their fathers had been friends and appealed to his generosity. The result was that Abi Singh took possession of the province which he held for a time and then finally made it over to the Mahrattas. The province of Malwa at the time was also governed by a Hindu, Raja Girdhar. It also was invaded year by year by the Mahrattas, and although help was called for from the Imperial Court no help ever was forthcoming. After Raja Girdhar's death and after that of his successor, Malwa also fell into the Mahratta's hands. All this time Nizam-ul-Mulk had been more or less looking on. We are given indeed by Khafi Khan a panegyric on this Chief. "In a short time the country was brought under the control of the Mussalman authorities, it was scoured from the abominations of infidelity and tyranny. Under former Subahdars the roads had been infested with the ruffianism of highway robbers, and the rapacity of the Mahrattas and rebellious zamindars, so that traffic and travelling were stopped; but now the highways were safe and secure. The Mahrattas exacted the chouth with all sorts of tyranny from the jagirdars; and in addition to it, ten per cent. under the name of sur-desh-mukhi was collected from the zamindars and rayats. By these means odious kamaish-dars were removed and changed every week and month; orders beyond all the endurance of the rayats were issued, and annoyances and insults were heaped upon the collectors of the jagirdars. Nizam-ul-Mulk so arranged that, instead of the chouth of the subah of Haidarabad, a sum of money should be paid from his treasury; and that the sur-desh-mukhi, which was levied from the rayats at the rate of ten per cent., should be abandoned. He thus got rid of the presence of the kamaish-dars of the chouth, and the gumashtas of the sur-desh-mukhi and the rahdari, from which latter impost great annoyance had fallen upon travellers and traders."* There is this much truth in the above statement that, as regards the part of the country which Nizam-ul-Mulk himself effectively ruled, that is roughly the present state of Haidarabad, he managed, by reason of regular payments of the Mahratta demands, to save it from incessant invasion ; otherwise, I am afraid the praise is undeserved. A great intriguer, he attempted to bring again to the front the rival claims of the Kolapur Raja and proposed to be the arbitrator between him and Sahoo. He made the mistake in this matter of suggesting that revenues paid under the head of chouth and sur-desh-mukhi should be sequestrated until he had given his award. The result was war between himself and the Peshwa. Nizam-ul-Mulk possessed a powerful park of artillery, but his troops had none of the mobility of the Mahrattas and so after an ineffective campaign, he found himself in great straits and was forced to negotiate. The treaty which followed, stipulated that security should be afforded in the future for the collections of the Mahratta revenues and that all arrears should be made good. There was also a request that the Kolapur Raja Sambhaji who was in Nizam-ul-Mulk's camp should be surrendered, but this the Muhammedan Chief refused to grant. An amusing story is told of this Sambhaji. " He requested at the conclusion of an interview to say a word in private to Nizam-ul-Mulk, and when he got him alone begged of him not to give any money on account of the subsidy to his Karkoons (agents) as they would defraud the troops. At the same time the Brahmins by another representation, also private, represented that Sambhaji would spend the whole on dancing girls ; dissipate it in drinking and debauchery ; and leave them to starvation, and the troops to revolt."*

---

* Duff, Vol. I. p. 486.

* Elliot, Vol. VII, p. 530.

It was in the next two or three years between 1729-1732 that Gujarat and Malwa may be said to have finally come into the Mahratta's hands. Having now obtained these provinces, the Peshwa was in a position to enforce his views to strike for the sovereignty of Hindustan itself. The opposition which he had met in the early days of his Peshwaship still troubled him, and although the chiefs, the ancestors of the two great families of Scindia and Holkar, on the whole, stood by him, he was never supported by the Bhonslas who subsequently became the ruling power in Nagpore ; this family never indeed cordially united with the other Mahrattas in pushing towards Northern India. Bundelkund was the first country to be invaded. Muhammad Khan Bangash, a Rohilla, had recently established himself there by dispossessing a couple of Hindu Rajas who were at the time in semi-independent rule of this province. The Mahrattas employed their usual tactics, cut off supplies, and brought Muhammad Khan into great straits, from which he was only rescued by a force of his own clan, headed by his only son. He had, however, to retreat to Allahabad and leave the Mahrattas in possession of the province. The Rajputs fared hardly better; Mewar and Jodhpur were both overrun and forced to pay tribute. The cohesion, if not the gallantry of this race, seems not to have been the same as it was in the days of Akbar or even of Shah Jahan, when, as Imperial Generals, they were foremost in the Imperial armies. The resistance in Rajputana to the Mahrattas was but slight.

---

* Duff, Vol. I, p. 502.

The Imperial Court during all this time was too engrossed in debauchery and in intrigue to do anything. More than once, indeed, an army was got together which was about to sweep these rascally Mahrattas from the face of the earth, but after marching a few stages and killing a few robbers, it would return quite pleased with itself and the victorious General would obtain some one of the many epithets with which Eastern Muhammedan Monarchs have in recent days been so fond of decorating their servants. The Seir Mutakherin says as regards one of these great Generals that the people in private repeated of him the following verse: "You to perform such a business. Is it so that the braves behave?"* Up from Bundelkund, further north struck the Mahratta hordes. The only General who seems to have been successful against them was Saadat Khan, who had already made himself semi-independent in Oudh.

The Court had, on the news of Baji Rao's march north, been thrown into the greatest confusion and were ready to admit his most exorbitant demands. A Mahratta is not particularly modest in such matters and what they were then requesting, was virtually that the whole of India South of the Chambal should be made over to them. But while these negotiations were going on, Saadat Khan in A. D. 1736 crossed the Ganges from Oudh and drove a large body of the Mahratta troops across the Jumna. The news of his success puffed up the Imperial Court with an idea that the Mahrattas were not so terrible after all, but Baji Rao very soon disillusioned it. Marching rapidly north and avoiding the Imperial armies he encamped at the very gates of Delhi. He was afraid, however, to maintain himself there as Nizam-ul-Mulk was in the south and he was afraid lest the latter should take advantage of his absence to collect the revenues of Malwa and generally to injure the Mahratta power in the south. Accordingly, contenting himself with 13 lakhs of rupees paid by the Imperial Government and a promise of the Government of Malwa which indeed he already efficiently held, Baji Rao retreated south. In the meanwhile, Nizam-ul-Mulk appeared at last in Court and had the Governorship of Malwa and Gujarat granted to him in the name of his eldest son Ghazi-ud-din. On his side he promised to drive the Mahrattas out of these provinces. The consequence was a campaign in what is now the modern State of Bhopal between the Peshwa and Nizam-ul-Mulk. The same old mistakes were committed by the latter. Instead of attacking, he fortified himself near Seronj, and although the Mahrattas could not attack him with any success owing to his artillery, they so straitened his supplies that after attempts made to save him by his son by means of an army from the Deccan had failed (no attempt was made in the Delhi direction where the courtiers only talked but did nothing), he was forced to come to an agreement with the Peshwa. The main terms of this treaty, were the grant to Baji Rao of Malwa and the complete sovereignty of all the territory between the Nerbudda and the Chambal. Nizam-ul-Mulk further agreed to obtain the confirmation of these terms and to use every endeavour to procure a subsidy of 50 lakhs of rupees from the Emperor. The Peshwa said he tried his best to get something out of the old man himself, but Nizam-ul-Mulk, who was very fond of his money, declined and Baji Rao did not press the point. So by this year, 1738, the Moghul Empire had ceased, save in name, to exist in the whole of Southern India (save in isolated places such as the port of Surat) and in a very considerable part of Hindustan itself. In its place everywhere was to be found Mahratta rule, save where Nizam-ul-Mulk had established his own dominions. In the part, moreover, which still remained of the Empire, provinces such as Bengal, Behar, Oudh and Cabul, were under Muhammedan Governors more or less semi-independent. Indeed, it was in such provinces rather than in the remaining parts of the Empire that good Governors were to be found, men like Saadat Khan and Ali Verdi Khan who were on the whole strong rulers, not inclined to put up with more disorder than they could help, whereas in the Provinces under direct Imperial control every man did much as he chose. A Jat chief of banditti named Churaman Singh established himself at this time at Bharthpur and robbed right up to the gates of Delhi and Agra. On the whole, if we are to judge by the fact that those people are the happiest of whom history is the most silent, the people of the Punjab would seem to have been the best off at the time, for history as regards them is almost entirely silent. The Sikhs only rose again after Nadir Shah's invasion and there was no sedition of any moment during the first twenty years of the Emperor's reign. In Delhi itself disturbances broke out from time to time. On one occasion in a 'holi' riot the mob took possession of the town for days. Such was the state of things when Nadir Shah in the latter part of 1738 invaded India and led his soldiery to the attack and plunder of the Imperial Capital. About this Nadir Shah and the kingdom of Persia I must now say a few words.

* Seir Mutakherin, Vol. I, p. 268.

My readers will remember how at the beginning of the 16th century Shah Ismail became the first ruler of the National Dynasty over Persia after many centuries of subjection to the foreigner, either Arab or Turkoman, and how his fortunes were connected with those of Mirza Baber. When Humayun fled from Sher Shah, the Persian ruler was considered one of the greatest rulers in the East and a few years later in the reign of Shah Abbas, commonly known as Shah Abbas the Great, Persia rose to a position which it has never since occupied. This great King, for he was really great, and not only called so by way of flattery, died about the same time as Jahangir and after his death, according to law which governs almost all Oriental Dynasties, the Kingdom of Persia began to decay; it conquered indeed after much fighting Kandahar from Shah Jahan, but all the same its history during the greater part of the 17th century is one of constant decline. Then came a foreign invader Mahmud, an Afghan, who led his countrymen against Shah Husain the effeminate descendant of the great Abbas, who was then on the Persian throne, defeated him and after a siege of Ispahan lasting many months in which the besieged suffered all the pangs of privation and semi-starvation, took possession of this city in the early part of 1723. Mahmud was a pure butcher; his rule was nothing but one of a series of massacres and when he died his cousin Ashraf found that the blood won conquest could not be maintained. Nominally under Shah Tahmasp of the old dynasty, but really under Nadir Shah a robber chief, the Afghans were driven headlong out of Persia A. D. 1727. Nadir Shah did not belong to the Tajiks, the town dwellers, who are Persians in the strict sense of the term, but sprang from one of the many Turkoman Nomadic tribes which have wandered for many a long year about the various plains of Persia and to one of which the present ruling dynasty of Persia belongs. He signalled the commencement of his rule by an attempt to change the faith of the Persian from Shiah to Sunni Muhammedanism. In this he failed, as indeed all attempts in this state to make such a change, have failed. In political matters and in material matters in general, the Oriental is very much a child, he can be led or driven wherever a strong power wills, but once the question of religion is touched, the child is found to be a full grown man with an indomitable will and so Nadir Shah found. He had other work to do besides attempting to change the Persian religion. In the first instance he had to restore the boundaries of Persia which had been infringed on all sides. As regards these attempts at restoration on the West and North against Russian and Turk this history has nothing to do. Different, however, is the case with his attempts in the East. In the case of the Afghans, first of a he had to drive these completely out of Persia, and secondly, the found it necessary to capture Kandahar from an Afghan who eventually had set himself as the ruler up there, and who was plundering all round as far as Multan on the East, and Herat on the West.

It was after his campaign at Kandahar that Nadir Shah came in contact with the Moghul Empire. A number of the Afghans in their flight had entered the Moghul dominions and Nadir Shah demanded their surrender. Ambassadors were sent to the Imperial Court but no heed was taken of their representations, indeed the officials there, whose arrogance was only equalled by their imbecility, would hardly allow them an audience. Nadir Shah on his side was not a man with whom to trifle. First of all he attacked Cabul, the Governor of which place at the time was Nasir Khan. The latter had little stomach for the fight. Like so many of the rulers of distant provinces he had constantly been demanding money from the Court, but to none of his representations had any attention been paid. In one of his letters he describes himself as a rosebush withered by the blast of autumn and the soldiery as a faded pageant, ill provided and without spirit. All the same no money came, although promises were plentiful, and so when Nadir Shah attacked the town and province of Cabul he met with but little resistance. He was fortunate also in another way. Invaders of India, as well as those who attempt to attack Afghanistan and Beluchistan from India have constantly found the mountain tribes along the Sulaiman range of hills as the greatest of obstacles. The Delhi Court, from the days of Akbar's generals' campaigns in Yusufzai lands, had found that the wisest as well as the cheapest policy was to subsidize these tribes, in return for which they undertook to keep some sort of order within this mountainous land. Somewhat similar is the present policy of the Indian Government which endeavours by enlistment and by pecuniary help in different forms, to keep these tribes in a state of quietude. But the Delhi Government had no money for anything of the sort, and so now that Nadir Shah was coming, instead of these tribes acting as obstacles in his path, they, on the other hand, welcomed him, and followed in his train hoping to share in the plunder of Hindustan. He passed from Cabul to India by the orthodox road traversed by so many conquerors before him, through the Khaiber, crossed the Indus by boats at Attock and routed the troops sent against him by the Subahdar of the Punjab near Lahore. This city was spared, the Governor having paid Nadir Shah a large sum on this account. By this time the Delhi Court was alarmed. A large army under the command of Khan Dauran, an incompetent minister, who for many years had done nothing but ruin the country, was gathered together to arrest the invader. It marched as far as Karnal where it encamped. Saadat Khan joined it shortly after its arrival there. Nizam-ul-Mulk was in Delhi at the time with an army, but he never seems to have intended to take any considerable share in the fighting. At Karnal a battle was fought; the losses on the sides of the Persians were but trifling; nor indeed did the Moghuls lose many more, but Khan Dauran was killed and Saadat Khan taken prisoner. This determined the fate of the campaign. Messages passed between the two armies with the result that the Emperor visited Nadir Shah's camp. The Seir Mutakherin suggests that Nadir Shah was in the first instance willing to make peace there and return forthwith to his own country, but that Saadat Khan who had become inordinately jealous of Nizam-ul-Mulk, inasmuch as he believed that the latter had supplanted him in the Emperor's Council, sent word to Nadir Shah that Delhi was close by, that there was nothing to oppose him, and that this city was rich with wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. Anyhow Nadir Shah determined on making no treaty on the spot but to proceed along with Muhammad Shah to Delhi. I may say here, that the story told that after the departure of the Persian King, that Saadat Khan and Nizam-ul-Mulk mutually reproached each other as being the cause of the calamities that had followed Nadir Shah's invasion, that both agreed to take poison and that Saadat Khan did take it and died and that Nizam-ul-Mulk, crafty old man that he was, took some innocuous potion and lived, is hardly credible and may be dismissed from sober history. Nadir Shah and Muhammad Shah together entered Delhi. First of all there was absolutely quiet ; then a rumour came through the town that Nadir Shah was dead, some saying that he had died a natural death and some, that he had been stabbed by a Kalmuk woman of the harem. The consequence was an uprising in the town and a massacre of all stray Persian soldiers. Then the conqueror rose in his wrath and orders were issued for an indiscriminate slaughter. The streets of the town ran red with blood. The visitor to Delhi to this day is pointed out a low mosque standing where the Hindu Jewellers' Street, known as the "Dhariba," meets the stately Chandni Chowk, upon the balcony of which it is said Nadir Shah sat on the fateful day of the great massacre. As was to be expected, plunder went on as vigorously as bloodshed, and as is common in such cases, fire completed the work of destruction which blood and plunder had begun. Almost three and a half centuries before, Delhi had been thoroughly plundered by Timur's hordes, but since that time it had remained untouched. Consequently even although Agra had been the Court Capital during the days of the Moghul's greatest power, yet Delhi far more than Agra was the city in which the concentrated wealth of the Empire was. From this bloodshed and plunder Delhi never really entirely recovered, and it is only now at the present day, when it is becoming one of the great trade centres of Northern India, that it is really again gradually finding its old position: Great in reputation as being the centre of what had been the Moghul power it continued to be, and so at the time of the Mutiny it became the centre of all who dreamed that the Delhi Empire might again be restored, but with the sack of the town by Nadir Shah, its wealth and material greatness departed, and in the period which elapsed between the sack and its occupation by the forces of the East India Company, its greatness consisted simply in its name. It had ceased to be the ruling capital, in any sense, of India.

Nadir Shah returned to Persia with an enormous loot ; no more than Timur did he intend to stay. All the contents of the Delhi treasury consisting of money, both in gold and silver, as well as jewels and gold plate were carried off. Amongst other spoils was the great peacock throne. As the Muhammedan historian remarks—"in short, the accumulated wealth of three hundred and forty-eight years changed in a moment," and not only was the wealth of the Imperial Court carried away but strict enquiries were made into the resources of the people. Everyone of any importance was forced to ransom himself according to a scale which practically meant the taking away from the unfortunate person his whole property. Thus having extracted all that he could and having had his son married to one of the female descendants of Shah Jahan, Nadir Shah departed the way by which he came, and with his departure the Empire of the Moghuls really came to an end. For another few years Muhammad Shah and his successors still remained in Delhi, styling themselves as Moghul Emperors and ruled in name over some of the countries immediately adjoining the capital. Still from time to time ambitious Chiefs found the name of the great Moghul one wherewith to conjure; but all the same the Moghul Empire from this time ceased to exist. The whole of the South of India was either under the rule of the Mahrattas or of Nizam-ul-Mulk or of petty chiefs each of whom did what seemed right in his own eyes, and as regards Upper India, the Viceroys (Subahdars) became practically independent sovereigns. Sometimes one of these Viceroys would get himself named as Wazir, sometimes this office was held by one of the Delhi courtiers, but all power had passed away from the Imperial throne. Within thirty years of this date, the representative of the dynasty will be found under the tutelage of the East India Company to which he is obliged to grant the Diwanship, really the Government of Bengal, Behar and Orissa. Then, further on he will for a time pass under the tutelage of the Mahrattas, but never again will he possess independent power. In the great struggles to come for the Lordship of India, neither he nor any troops commanded by his officers will take a prominent place. A little over twenty years after Nadir Shah's invasion of India came another invasion by Ahmed Shah Abdali the Afghan. The opposition to him was not from any Moghul force but from the Mahrattas of the South. Against him on the historical plains of Panipat in the year 1761 A. D. was fought a battle on which depended the whole fate of India. In that battle the Mahratta power was shattered, and although the Afghans no more than the Persian obtained any permanent hold over India, it was the shattering of this Mahratta power which made way for the English. If it had not been so, and if the Mahrattas had won the fight at Panipat, the whole history of modern India would probably have been altered. It is the idlest of all idle thoughts to try and imagine what might have been, but it is not a matter of surprise that a modern Mahratta in his dreams looks back with regret to that fateful day and imagines that if events had turned out differently he, and not the white-skinned Englishman, would have been the Master of India at the present day.

EPILOGUE.

AFTER the return of Nadir Shah from Delhi set in what has been called the period of the Great Anarchy in Indian History. Its advent had been approaching for fifty years previous to the Persian ruler's invasion but only after this did it reign complete and supreme. The Mahrattas had inaugurated its reign before the death of Aurangzeb in the Deccan; the Civil wars and the feeble rule of his successors had helped it on in Hindustan in the thirty years after this Emperor's death; but now everywhere, except in the corners where some more masterful despot than the rest ruled with an iron hand, anarchy stepped forth, unabashed, undisguised as King, everywhere rule became the rule of the strongest. The Governors of Great Provinces of the Empire, although their rule was less nominal than that of the Emperor himself, were themselves by no means absolute masters of their respective Governments. Petty tyrants sprang up everywhere. Already the Peshwas had supplanted Sivaji's descendants and in their turn had been largely supplanted by the military heads of the Mahratta people, Scindia, Holkar, the Gaikwars, the Bhonsles and others. And the military chiefs themselves were by no means supreme, without rivals, within the lands over which they were supposed to rule. Smaller men, village bullies everywhere sprang up, who spread terror all around them and who only too often turned lands, which had been spared by the regular armies into deserts. Now and again a real ruler is to be found, such as Haider-Ali in Mysore, who insisted on obedience.

Some parts of India such as Bengal were too rich even for the marauding Mahratta absolutely to despoil; but on the whole India, which was already far on the down grade before Nadir Shah crossed the Sulaiman range, went down after his departure at an ever accelerated pace towards ruin. Nor did the first conquests of the English do much to change this state of things. They drove back indeed open anarchy, but at the same time they in their rapacity and their ignorance of Indian life rather furthered than checked the process of internal dissolution, until the latter years of the eighteenth century, when the period of constructive administration in the lands ruled by them began. What can be said for the British rule in its earliest stages is that by reason of its military successes it made a subsequent building up of the administration and a checking of internal disorder possible. The story of the growth of this anarchy, of this long prolonged agony comparable in English history to the reign of Stephen, when every man did what was good in his own eyes, as far as his neighbour was not strong enough to prevent him, is to be gathered from almost all the literature concerning India of the time. Nowhere is it to be found more fully set forth than in the pages of the Seir Mutakherin. Not that the writer of that book, Mir Ghulam Husain Khan, a nobleman of the province of Behar, had any idea that the period he was describing and in which he lived had the character which we have attributed to it. But rarely does it happen that he who lives in a troubled or indeed in any period of the world's history can appreciate correctly its bearings with the past or foresee how it will bear in the future, and this particular author, though he sighs over the disorders of the times and regrets the incapacity and cowardice of the chiefs, does not show the slightest appreciation of what all who study the epoch can see now, viz., that he was living in a period of absolute disorder. As to the English, he looks upon their arrival and conquest of the country as the worst of all the troubles which had befallen unhappy Hindustan. Some of his complaints, such as Englishmen's favouring of their own countrymen, their not taking into Government service nor giving sufficient important positions to Natives of India, of promotions going by seniority, of the draining India of a great part of her wealth and sending the same to Europe, of their listening to their underlings and very often to their own private servants, have a strangely modern sound. Similar complaints are not infrequent not only in the ephemeral native journalism of the day, but in the writings of temperate Indian writers of a much higher standard than the average journalist and have found their echo largely in Europe. Other complaints such as the want of open durbars, of the delays of justice, of entrusting too much power to the Zamindars savour more of the time. There is no doubt that the author missed alike the grandeur of open courts and the quick justice of the Moghuls. To him the license of abuse, allowed to disappointed suitors at the end of an unsuccessful hearing, was a sign of magnanimity, and the privacy of the English Courts as well as the protractedness of their proceedings were abominations. But above all stands out as his main objection to the English that whereas the Moghuls, when they conquered, took the greatest interest in maintaining or increasing the prosperity of the conquered country, the English, on the other hand, thought only of seizing all its riches for themselves. He tells how when Shah Alam of Delhi invaded Behar in the early sixties of the eighteenth century the people first favoured him, but finding his army a rabble given over to plunder and the English troops under discipline transferred all their sympathies to the latter. But he writes "those people (the natives of Behar) feel nothing for them (the Englishman) now, fully sensible that these new rulers pay no regard or attention to the concerns of Hindustanians, and that they suffer them to be mercilessly plundered, fleeced, oppressed, and tormented by those officers of their appointing, and by their other dependants; these same people, I say, reduced now to despair, have altered their language, and totally changed in their hearts, on finding that their rulers had so far altered from what they had seemed to be."

II.

Muhammad Shah lived after Nadir Shah's departure for another nine years; his two successors, fainéant Emperors, nominally ruled one for six and the second for five years. The latter was put to death by his Prime Minister, a grandson of Nizam-ul-Mulk, a monster of brutality even amongst the most brutal of the time, and the next Emperor Shah Alam the II as he was named who reigned in name for forty-seven years up to 1806 A. D., lived to see the English Masters of Delhi. This last-named Emperor never really was in power over any part of the vast Empire of which he was the nominal overlord. It was very early in his reign, 1761 A. D., that the Mahrattas, who in the years following Nadir Shah's invasion had overrun and plundered most of Western and a part of Eastern Hindustan, met the crushing defeat of Panipat. The Afghan invaders under Ahmed Shah Adali shivered the finest force the Mahrattas had ever put into the field into a thousand fragments. As often before, so then it was shown that the lighter native of India, active and courageous though he be, is no match for the heavier built warrior of Afghanistan and Central Asia. It was really Panipat rather than Plassey that decided the fate of Modern India. With it was shattered for ever the hope of a Mahratta Empire stretching from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin. Never again do we find the Mahrattas really united in any enterprise of moment. Thereafter more than half their strength is expended in internecine conflict, one military chief fighting with another. And most important of all, as far as the English were concerned, after Panipat, Upper India was left alone during the eventful years from 1761 on to 1782. The English in India during those years had in their wars in Hindustan not to deal with the Mahrattas, who alone at that time, away from far distant Mysore, could boast of having an army worthy of the name. On the other hand, the opponents of the English were almost entirely a rabble which some Muhammedan Governor, himself too often a poor Harem dwelling creature, could manage to get together and which had no idea of fighting save as a preliminary to plunder. The armies of Murshidabad and Lucknow alike were void of the first elements of discipline or military cohesion and proved themselves no match for the handful of Europeans and Natives—such were the early English armies—who, on the other hand, were properly drilled and handled. And so it happened that long before the change was realised, the English had made themselves the strongest power in Hindustan. When at the beginning of the nineteenth century they had to meet a stubborn opposition in Upper India, it came not from any Hindustani power but from the Mahrattas whose home was the Deccan and who in a sense might be deemed foreigners in the land. It was not till the Sikh wars (omitting the Nepal war as the Gurkhas can hardly be termed Hindustanis) that the East India Company's mixed army of Europeans and Natives met in Upper India a foe worthy of its steel. And it was in these Sikh wars too that the insufficiency of the Native Sipahis of the Ganges lands, however well drilled, to meet the hardier and bigger soldiers of the Punjab, was first demonstrated. From these wars the day of the Hindustani Sipahi as the Eastern fighting man of the British Raj was at an end. The Mutiny only consummated the change. British India was conquered mainly by a small number of English troops supplemented by a much larger number of Hindustani troops drilled and disciplined in English fashion. British India, in fact India—for all India is British now—is at present guarded and protected by a large body of English troops, supplemented by a larger force of Native troops in which the Sikhs and Muhammedans of the Punjab and the Gurkhas of Nepal take the foremost place. If ever India is to be exposed to invasion in the North-West, the protagonists on the British side will be the soldiers just named. Instead of the invader from the N.-W. meeting the Hindustani Sipahi as he would have done forty years ago, he will encounter besides the British soldiers the Punjabi, the hill men of the North-West and the Gurkha of Nepal.

Why these are better and more reliable soldiers is not far to seek. Climate and race both explain. Hot dry summers, cold winters—such climates—produce the hardier men. Witness the tribes of Western Central Asia, the men who supplied Taimur and Babar with their armies and who have ever shown themselves as possessing the greatest endurance and courage. Even a hot climate without much winter, if it be dry, produces a hardy race. Witness the Arabs, who in the seventh and eighth centuries overran a great part of the known world. But the hot steamy valley of the Ganges where heat is joined to excessive humidity is not a climate fitted to produce such men. Many as the virtues are of the races who inhabit what the Germans call Wet India—roughly speaking the lands East of the parallel of longitude running through Allahabad—keen thinkers as they may be, their native lands are.

not fitted to rear a powerful nation at arms. And not only climate but race is also an ingredient in the breeding of such a race. The Jat peasantry of the Punjab almost certainly at some not too far distant period—came from the colder and severer lands of Central Asia. So probably at some more distant time indeed did the high caste races of Oudh, Bihar and Bengal. The races who burst through the hills that stretch from Rajmahal across Central India, and settled in the Delta below must have been endowed with intrepidity of no common sort. But yet a land, in which it seemeth always afternoon, in time will change (away from all questions of change of food, in itself a most powerful faction in the formation of character) any race characteristics and will in time lessen the active, though it may increase the passive virtues.

When, however, all has been said, the history of the Indian armies, from the time that Clive in the forties of the eighteenth century defended Arcot, up to the siege of Delhi in 1857 and the capture of Lucknow in 1858, is one of the most wonderful in the world's history. The English, absolute foreigners, managed to attach men during these 110 years from various parts of India to serve under their flag in various parts of India and sometimes beyond, with no further power of attraction than the promise of regular pay. Mercenaries have been known throughout the world's history: daredevils, with a dislike to regular industry, have always been found who have been willing to kill and be killed for a moderate remuneration. But it is only in days when the ordinary means of industry and livelihood are hard to obtain, that any considerable part of a population become willingly mercenaries. In cases such as in the latter part of the Thirty Years' War, when Germany had been turned into a desert, and when regular occupations were at an end, then naturally the younger and stronger turned to the one occupation whereby a livelihood might be gained, i.e., the camp. And again in German History we read of the smaller Princes forcibly making their subjects as soldiers and selling them to a foreign prince. Thus England hired Hessian troops in her vain attempt to conquer her revolted American colonies. But the English in India did not get their soldiers in this last fashion. The reason why the English got whatever soldiers they wanted was largely the same as that which caused the contending powers in Germany from 1635 on to get as many men as they could pay, i.e., soldiering was the only lucrative industry at the time. But in India too, besides the fact that anarchy had driven many men from their regular business, there was another reason which made the recruitment of Sipahis not difficult. In the first instance, the fighting classes in India, those who by caste rules and feeling, consider soldiering the only fit profession for a gentleman, far exceed any such class in Europe. They could indeed get service under a Native Prince, but with him, however grand the promises, the chances of fulfilment were precarious. Far otherwise was it with the East India Company, where as an almost universal rule, pay was punctual and where once promised, was never afterwards withheld. Add to this what we have said above, i.e., that soldiering according to prices then prevailing was paid much better than any other profession, which the professional soldier could ordinarily join, and the secret how the Indian army was welded together is largely disclosed. Without, however, a feeling of camaraderie and of confidence between the white officer and the native soldier all these reasons would have been insufficient. It was this which completed the chain by which the Company's armies were forged into one whole. It was the lessening of this feeling of camaraderie and of friendship, which was one of the main sources of the Mutiny. The officer got too far apart from the soldier. The same complaint which is made now often in Civil life that there is no real friendship between the English administrative officers and the natives of the country was much to be heard in the immediate pre-Mutiny days. And there is no doubt that such a complaint implies something very wrong. It is not well with any country, certainly not with India, when such a complaint is true. And at the present day, the most important factor in Indian administration is this feeling of sympathy and friendship. Without it the Indian Government would be only what the Germans call Byzantismus. The administrative machine moves on like the Car of Juggernath, crushing, flattening everywhere, but the result, even if it make for physical prosperity, must be disastrous. Often it is said that the mass of work that a European officer has to get through, the fact that he can now spend all his leave owing to the quick passages procurable to Europe, alike prevent him from getting to know and to like the native as he did of yore. If this be so, and I believe, there is some truth in it, it would be better to lessen the amount of work called for from each officer, much of it of the purely mechanical sort which can be done by a subordinate staff, to change leave rules so as to ensure that officers should spend a part of their leave in India, than to allow a system to continue, which may result in an alienation between the rulers and the ruled ; a state of things more likely to be disastrous to India's peaceful progress than any other cause which, in my opinion, is at present at work.

III.

As regards Administration, it is a cardinal point either in studying the History of India in the past or in applying oneself to the problems of India of to-day to remember that the present system had really its origin in the days of Akbar. Sher Shah indeed may have suggested by his acts much which Akbar and Todar Mull worked out ; but these two latter are the real founders of Modern Administrative India. Previous to them we find nothing which would correspond to a modern State. Village communities have ruled themselves in India since days immemorial. Princes, both Hindu and Muhammedan, have taken from these villages and from the more complex townships, funds wherewith to hold a Court or equip an army ; Afghan rulers and Rajput Rajas have established on a large scale tribal rule ; at times, indeed, as with some of the Afghan rulers of Delhi, this rule has extended over a great part of Hindustan ; but the Administrative rule of modern days sometimes half contemptuously called bureaucracy, stretching its web over man's manifold transactions, really first came into existence with Akbar. As in the ancient world, Monarchy after Monarchy, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Macedon, became one after the other for a period world Monarchies, but the first that really entwined itself round the various populations comprised within it, so that all felt bound by one common administration and law, was Rome, so in the case of India it was the Moghuls that first created Hindustan in the modern sense a State. How strong the fetters were that were forged, what lasting power they had, is to be seen from the fact that when the Moghul Empire went into a thousand bits, when the Emperors became puppets and the Governors of Provinces became unable to put down the disorders which arose everywhere, the old forms still existed, the old methods were still nominally pursued and the old names and styles still endured. The English in India really took up the Moghuls' work, making that a reality which for the half century before them had been but a mockery. And in spite of all that may be said against it, it is in the working out of this bureaucratic administration that the future of India seems to depend. Constitutions, it cannot too often be said, are not commonly made; they ordinarily grow by rules much the same as other organic growths. In no country less than India could there ever be a tabula rasa, a going back to the state of things such as existed before the days of Akbar. In Modern Europe we find two styles of Government, which may be termed the Prussian or bureaucratic and the English or popular. In the former the State is managed much as a wise proprietor would manage a private estate; service in it is almost universally paid, the work is economically and as a rule well done, but it lacks the spontaneousness and the freedom of the other system. Whether this lack is compensated by the superior efficiency of the work done, is a matter concerning which it is not necessary here to say anything. The point is that for good or for evil India has got no choice. The Prussian method of Government is the only one possible for her. Modifications indeed may be made in the popular direction, but the Government must be carried on, if anarchy is not to come again, after the Prussian fashion; and this being so, line upon line and step upon step is the only policy which the British Government of India can pursue. It was more than three hundred years from the date when the first non-Italians were made Roman citizens to the day that Caracalla gave that dignity to all the subjects of the Empire. In less than a hundred years from the days of Lord William Bentinck, the British Government has made great steps in the direction taken by the Roman Rulers of old. Indians have been associated with the Administration, the personal law governing the various races of India have been largely codified and steps have been taken to give these races a voice in the making of laws. And the process thus begun is still going on. Where it will end no one can tell. The problem is, in some respects, far more difficult than that to which the Cæsars addressed themselves. The English are fewer than the Romans were in the provinces, the transition from race to race in the old world State was gradual, here it is one great leap. The countries forming the Roman Empire were geographically connected; some thousands of miles separate the shores of India from Great Britain. On the other hand, the races of India are easier to deal with than most of the races which formed the Roman Empire; and steam has largely annihilated distances of space. And again the Romans had no previous Governments of world or continental States, save the Hellenistic States to a small degree, from which to take advice or warning. They worked out their administration and their civilisation in their own way and by their own unaided lights. And in spite of its many defects, what a wonderful administration and civilisation it was. Not only was Rome the mother of Modern Europe, but a Semitic race such as the Arabs and an Eastern race such as the Persians, were profoundly influenced by her. England has in any case the example of Rome both for an admonition and a warning ever before her. And we may say that even already her administration has shown as wonderful results as Roman rule ever did. The awakening of Asia is slow, but it awakens all the same. Japan has been the fastest to move, but China as well as India are rapidly proceeding on Western paths. And we may say without exaggeration that this awakening is mainly, if not almost entirely, the work of England. The United States and Russia may have had some influence; but even combined, their influence has been, if compared with English, insignificant. And as to India itself, its railways, canals, roads, ports and on the other side its universities, schools, educated men—all speak most eloquently of the enormous influence of England on India. And yet it would be as wrong to exaggerate this influence as to depreciate it. In spite of all England has done or taught, her influence has not yet penetrated so deep that if her protecting hand were withdrawn for fifty years, the probabilities are not great that nothing of it would remain. The Intellectuals in India have throughout the country, even in some cases by the method of aversion, been profoundly influenced by England. Of this there can be no doubt whatsoever. Even more powerfully have the people at large been moved by economic reasons, by the growth of communications, by the possibilities of selling what they may have to sell at a distance from home and by the consequent demand for what they produce by people from a distance—all of which are results of English rule. And yet by far the greater part of the population follow agricultural pursuits; excepting the Presidency towns, great towns, which are not simply magnified villages, are few; the great mass of the people never, save perhaps for a local fair, travel a dozen miles from where they are born; all the articles of their daily consumption are still produced on the spot (cotton goods perhaps should here be mentioned as an exception) and to all outward seeming they pass their lives, absolutely uninfluenced by any foreign forces in the same way of life and with the same aims and methods of thinking, that their ancestors had in the villages in which their descendants now live two thousand years ago. E pur si muove, still there is movement, though slow, and the foreign leaven is working—working even in matters such as the tilling of the soil—little by little strange methods are being introduced; strange implements, modified to meet local requirements, taking the place of the older pure Indian instruments of work.

To sum up the whole matter, with the fostering care of England, for another limited period of time, limited in relation to a nation's history in which not years but tens of years and even fifties of years stand as units, there seems to be, humanly speaking, a certainty that the masses of India will be developed into something different from what they were a hundred years ago, from what they are now. If this fostering care should be withdrawn, if the people of India were left to themselves to work out their own salvation, it is impossible to prophesy what would be their future. The probabilities are—(I take it for granted that English rule is not superseded by some other foreign rule such as Russian, German or Japanese) that the warlike races of Upper India would seize the land and put the Intellectuals—who at the present day are mainly to be found in the warmer parts of India near the sea into a position of hopeless inferiority, using them for their purposes but by no means being guided by them as to their methods of government. That English influence is entirely for good, I do not think any candid observer of matters of India can well maintain. But that it is mainly for good I fancy almost every Indian will acknowledge. Many of us look into misgivings on what seems to be an inevitable result of English rule, the introduction of the economic conditions of the West into the East. There is Capitalism here true; there is a proletariat also true; but at present there is none of the class antagonism which is such an unpleasant feature in the West of to-day. The joint family among the Hindus in the past is rapidly being undermined and with it the greatest resisting power to the Western fierce individual all-pervading hunt after wealth. That more capital is needed in India, that it will be better for her if she can work up more of the raw products in which she abounds into manufactured articles without having to send them to a foreign country—all this is true. But such gain would be dearly bought, if along with it came the turning of the Indian peasant's life into one of dull unending blind labour, such as is the lot of a large part of the manufacturing population of the West. In India though the sun is most of the year hot, still it is almost always to be had; people live largely in the open air; and the change, if the rustic is to become a denizen of great towns, would be not one of unmixed advantage. Sun, air, water, all are plentiful (some will say too plentiful, and so they may be for the pale Western but not ordinarily for the acclimatised Eastern), are all great blessings, and if the result of English rule were to rob a great part of the population of their enjoyment of these, the loss would be great indeed. It is to be hoped that neither the Government by its legislation nor the leaders of the people by their influence, nor economic causes, which are stronger than either Government or popular leaders, will bring about such a result. "Better twenty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay" may be all very well for those with wealth and leisure, but for the masses—given the choice between a Western factory with its gray, never ceasing toil and the life of an Eastern peasant—and most, I think, would prefer the latter.

INDEX.

---

Abdullah Khan became Wazir, 173; took part with the besieging force at Allahabad, 182; placed another scion of the House of Timur on the throne, getting together a fresh army, 184; fought magnificently at Husainpur against the royal troops—his army dispersed and he was taken prisoner—died in captivity in 1722 A. D., 185.

Abdur Razaq Lari, the only noble who was faithful to his King to the last—Aurangzeb forced him to enter his service, 138.

Abu-l-Fath Khan, 110.

Afzal Khan killed at the hands of Sivaji, 105.

Ahmednuggur Kingdom—end of, 47.

Ahmed Shah Abdali invaded India—opposed by Mahrattas of the South, 203.

Ajit Singh, son of Jeswant Singh, 127.

Akana, one of the Chief Ministers in Golkonda, 133.

Akbar the Great—his administrative methods, 1; his death, 8.

Ali Mardan Khan, Persian Governor of Kandahar, 51.

Ali Verdi Khan, 198.

Amin Khan, son of Mir Jumla, sent to rule Kabul, 96.

Amir Jamla, favourite of Farokh Siar, 172.

Amir Jamla, sole head of the Bengal Army and Viceroy of Bengal, given the title of Khan Khanan—died A. D. 1682—his invasion of Assam, 94; burial practices of the Assamese—tribute of the Assamese to Aurangzeb, 95.

Amir-ul-Umara, 108.

Arjun, the fifth Guru, 165.

Asad Khan made Wazir by Shah Alam, 161; seized, imprisoned, and deprived of all his property by Farokh Siar—a series of assassinations in his reign, 173; his death—Farokh Siar's message to him, 179.

Asaf Khan, his stratagem of proclaiming Dawar Buksh as Emperor in order to secure the succession of Shah Jahan, 35.

Aurangzeb, a dweller in tents, 11; his letter to Murad, 58; wary in accepting his father's invitation to see him within the Imperial Harem—his sister Roshanara Begam warned him against it, 62; took possession of the town in the Imperial Harem, 63; gave out that he will seat his brother Murad on the throne—invited Murad to a feast at which Murad drank to excess—sent him to prison at Gwalior and executed him, 65; proceeded to Delhi—took his seat on the throne as Padshah on 16th July 1658—after his second coronation at Agra Khutba said in his own name and his own name stamped on the coins, 66; publicly paraded Dara Shikoh and his grandson through the bazaars, 69; introduced innovations which eventually caused the overthrow of the Moghul power, 72; compared to King Philip of Spain, 73; his character, 74; his great leniency to his subjects—his panegyric, 75; his prohibition against singing and dancing, 79; Fatwa Alamgiri, a code of Muhammedan Law, made in his reign, 80; his speech to his tutor when he presented himself for some preferment, 80; forbade, in the tenth year of his reign, any history of his time being written, 83; on his accession to the throne ordered abolition of several taxes, 87; embassies from Persia, Mawar-un-Nahr, Dutch Eastern Colonies, Sharif of Mecca, Prince of Bassora, and Abyssinia came to him, 89; his wars with the Rajputs, with Bijapur and with the Mahrattas, 97; sent troops against Sivaji soon after he became Emperor, 108; destroyed the temple of Bishnath in Benares, 117; the great temple at Muttra destroyed in his reign, 117; his exemption of Mussulmans' goods from customs dues, 118; imposed the Jizya before Sivaji's death 1680 A. D., 120; his troops gained a victory over an enemy superior in numbers in Golkonda, 133; joined the troops against

- Bijapur and was victorious, 135; laid siege to Golkonda, 137; in 1698 A. D. established his head-quarters at Brahmपुरi on the Beema, 144; drifted into war with the Portuguese and English, 145; his letters to his sons shortly before his death, 151; attacked at Dobari and forced to retreat by the Rajputs, 128; his treaty with the Rajputs, 130; his final advance against Bijapur and Golkonda, 133; his character, 153; his death at Ahmednuggur in 1707 A. D., 151; released Sambhaji's son Sahu, for many years Aurangzeb's prisoner, 158; laid siege to Bijapur, 45.
- Badakshan—fighting in, 51; Prince Murad commanding Imperial army in—recalled in disgrace, 51.
- Baji Ghorpuraiik of Mundhaul, 102.
- Baji Rao, Peshwa, 192; his successful march to the north—Court ready to admit his most exorbitant demands, 190; encamped at the very gates of Delhi, and contenting himself with 13 lakhs of rupees, retreated south, 197; Malwa and sovereignty of territory between the Nerbudda and the Chambal given to him by Nizam-ul-Mulk, 197.
- Balaji Vishvanath, a Brahmin, with his descendants known as the Mahratta Peshwas—acknowledged heads of the Mahratta Confederacy, 186.
- Banda, successor to Govind Singh—his capture of Sirhind, 167; made prisoner with his son and Diwan, and paraded through the streets of Delhi—his execution, 177.
- Battle of Oojein, 1658 A. D., 59.
- Begam Sahiba, ordered all the temples in the Kimpire to be destroyed, 49; her support of Dara Shikoh, 63; stayed with Shah Jahan to the last—her reconciliation with Aurangzeb, 86.
- Bernier, Physician to Dara Shikoh, 68; his description of the Abyssinian Embassy—his account of all the Embassies to Aurangzeb, 90—93.
- Bijapur, Imperialists march into, but were forced to retire after suffering much want, 135; Bijapur, its ruler placed in confinement where he died—its ruins as at present existing are exceedingly grand—its ancient building restored in part by Lord Curzon, 126.
- Bikramjit, 49.
- Bindrabai Das, Bahadur Shahi, a historian, 84.
- Brahmapuri, camp at, abandoned, 145.
- Capt. Hawkins and Sir Thomas Roe at the Imperial Court, 32.
- Chabila Ram, 182.
- Chin Killioh Khan, 171.
- Chouth (one-fourth) revenue, 125.
- Churaman Singh, 198.
- Dadaji, guardian of Sivaji, 100.
- Dara Shikoh—lax in belief and practice of his religion—his character, 53; received Shah Jahan's blessing before going to fight, 60; panic in his army, 62; his flight to Agra and Delhi after Aurangzeb's victory, 63; took possession of Thatta—seized Ahmedabad—met Aurangzeb's forces at Ajmere and was routed, 67.
- Daud Khan fought against Hussain Ali Khan and was killed, 179.
- Daulat Khan, Governor of Kandahar, 51.
- Difficulties in subjugating the Rajputs, 19.
- Dilir Jung, Subahdar of Lahore, his successes against the Sikhs—thousands slain and taken prisoners, 177.
- Dilir Khan totally routed while trying to extricate Prince Akbar, 128.
- Durga Das, lord of Drunara, 129.
- Dutch in Masulipatam and Ceylon—a terror to the Portuguese, 30.
- English, in Surat—obstacles to their trade, 31; their factory and factors ordered to be seized by Aurangzeb owing to the largest Moghul ship having been captured by them, 146; Emperor agreed that the English should go on as they did before, 147; their rule in India, 206; conquered India with a small number of British troops, supplemented with a larger number of Native troops, 209; administration of India, 214; influence in India, 216.
- European settlements on the coast of India during the reign of Jahangir, 29.
- Europeans and semi-Europeans in the Native armies, 60.
- Fakhrun Nissa, Aurangzeb's eldest daughter, influenced state affairs, 86.
- Farokh Siar put on the throne in place of Jahandar Shah, 172; his invasion of Rajputana—his treaty with Ajit Singh, 174; religious disturbances in his reign, 174; his attempt to get rid of the control of Sayads Husain Ali Khan and Abdullah Khan, 180.
- Fateli Singh founded the Bhonsla family—story as to how Sahu adopted him as his son, 186.

Fath Khan placed in confinement the ruler of the Nizam Shahis, 45; submits to the Emperor—again fortifies himself for a siege—attacked by Khan Khanan and Khan Zaman—surrendered, 46.

Fatteh Khan, 116.

Fazl Muhammed Khan, Afsal Khan's son, 107.

Forced labour, 14.

Gerald Aungier, 120.

Ghazi-ud-din, 197.

Ghazi-ud-din Khan, known also as Nizam-ul-Mulk—thanked by Aurangzeb for relief given to Sultan Azam, 135.

Ginjee, siege of, 147.

Girdhar Bahadur, 182.

Golkonda, troops driven back by the Imperialists, 134; its nobles left their Kingdom and joined the Imperial troops—the kingdom lost by treachery, 138; King of, his flight into the Golkonda fort—pillage and devastation in. 134; begged the Emperor for peace, 1636 A. D.—humiliating conditions imposed on him, 135; surrendered with great dignity to Prince Azam—sent to Daulatabad as a prisoner, 138.

Govind Singh, tenth and last Guru, his Daswen Badshah ka Granth, 166; joined his fortunes to Bahadur Shah's—assassinated by an Afghan horse-dealer, 166.

Gujrat and Malwa harried by Rajput bands, 128.

Guru Nanak, the first Guru of the Sikhs—died 1539 A. D., 165.

Hamid Khan, Sir Buland Khan sent to supersede him in the Governorship of Gujarat, 193.

Hasim Ali Khan, a Muhammedan historian, wrote a history of Aurangzeb's forty-nine years' reign, 83; better known as Khafi Khan, 84.

Himat Khan, 148.

Husain Ali Khan appointed Subahdar of the Deccan, 173; fighting with the Mahrattas—entered into a treaty of peace, 180; Husain Ali Khan, marched to Court with his troops, accompanied by Mahratta auxiliaries—put Rafi-ud-Darjah on the throne, 181; marched against Chabila Ram, Governor at Allahabad, 182; Husain Ali Khan assassinated by Mir Hyder Khan, 184.

Imperial troops under Khan Khanan in the Balaghat reduced to great distress, 21.

India, her state after the departure of Nadir Shah from Delhi, 205.

Indian armies, 210.

Jahandar Shah, son of Shah Alam, succeeded him as Emperor, 170; with his son took the field against Husain Ali Khan and Abdullah Khan—defeated, 172.

Jafar Khan, ordered by Jahandar Shah to send Farokh Siar to Court, 172.

Jahangir, his exaggeration of his virtues and vices, 4; his exaggerated reforms, 5; his Memoirs, -6; his nomination to the throne by Akbar, 7; his father's last words to him, 8; his accession to the throne, 8; his love for camping, 11; his love of Kashmir, 14; his fondness of the society of Jogis, 14; his visit to a Darvesh, 15; his marriage with Nur Jahan, 16; his passion for hunting, 16; tribute paid to him by Rana Umrao Singh, 20; reduced the customs duties, 22; his character—his death, 29; his weight in gold, silver and other articles given away, 33; his interment at Lahore, 34.

Jai Singh, 111; did his best to subdue Bijapur but failed, 114.

Jajhar Sing, 49.

Jalsamad (voluntary death by water), 186.

Jeswant Singh acted treacherously to Prince Shujah, 70.

Jizira, its collection in Rajputana ceased, 130.

Kambaksh, after his mistake in the siege of Ginjee, set at liberty, but not permitted to return to the army, 147.

Kandahar, Imperial forces besiege, under the command of Prince Aurangzeb—after a three and a half years' siege abandoned, 51.

Karan Singh, Umrao Sing's grandson, representative at the Imperial Court, 20.

Kasim Khan, 59.

Kaum Buksh and his son Firozmand died of their wounds, 159.

Khafi Khan, his remarks regarding the English, 146.

Khalilullah Khan, traitor to Dara Shikoh, 62.

Khan Dauran, 190.

Khan Jahan Bahadur, Viceroy of the Deccan, 116.

Khan Jahan Lodi, rebelled against Shah Jahan—summoned to the Imperial Court, 41; escaped into Bundela country, 42.

Khan Khanan, discharged his duties in Shah Alam's reign with great justice and

- clemency, 161; abolished Mansabs, 162.
- Kharram, rebellion of, 24; defeated at Allahabad by Mahabat Khan, 24.
- Khusrav. Plans to make him Akbar's successor, 8; placed in semi-confinement by his father—his escape—his revolt—his defeat by the royal troops, 9; his surrender and imprisonment, 10.
- Kunwar Ram Singh, son of Jai Singh, 113.
- Lal Kuar, 171.
- Little Thibet raided by the Imperial army, 52.
- Lord Curzon restored in part the ancient buildings of Bijapur, 136.
- Madana, one of the chief Ministers in Golkonda, 133.
- Mahammad Sultan advanced with a force to Golkonda, 55.
- Mahabat Khan, a Rajput, converted to Mohammedanism, 21; rebelled owing to enmity of Nur Jahan's family, 25; forbidden to appear at Court on his return from the Deccan—several thousand Rajputs accompanied him—seized the Emperor in camp, 26; Governor of Kabul, died while about to visit Court, 96.
- Maharashtra, the country of the Mahrattas, 97.
- Mahbub Khan, caused religious disturbances in Kashmir, 176; his assassination by the Shialhs, 176.
- Mahmud, 199.
- Mahrattas, the foremost power in India in the middle of the 18th century, 97; their entry into Amir-ul-Umara's camp by stratagem, 110; sacked Broach and Burhanpur while the Imperial troops marched into Bijapur, 135; taxes levied by them, 144; granted chouth in the six Mogul Subahs of the Deccan also Sur-desh-mukhi from the revenue of the Deccan in perpetuity, 188; their power supreme south of the Vindhya, 189; Gujarat and Malwa finally came into their hands between 1729-1732 A.D., 195; their power shattered in the battle of Panipat against the Persians in 1761 A.D., 204; after Nadir Shah's invasion overran and plundered most of Western and a part of Eastern Hindustan, 208.
- Malik Ambar defeated by Jahangir's troops—his victory over Abdulla Khan below the Ghats, 22; routed the Bijapur troops near Ahmednuggur shortly before his death—his panegyric in the Memoirs—his death, 25.
- Malik Jiwan, traitor to Dara Shikoh, his seizure of Dara Shikoh and Sipah Shikoh, 68; received the title of Bahadur Khan, 69.
- Mallaji, his wealth, 98; story of one of his family becoming King, 99.
- Man Singh of Ambar, 6.
- Mauucci, a Venetian physician, 80.
- Mashabi Sikhs, 166.
- Mir Ahmed Khan collected a force to drive the rebels out of Srinagar, in the reign of Farokh Siar, but failed, 176.
- Mir Jumla, Chief Minister of Golkonda—his conquests on the Eastern coast, 54; escaped from Golkonda and placed by Aurangzeb among the Moghul nobility, 55; received the title of Muazzam Khan from Aurangzeb, 55; his imprisonment, 58.
- Mirza Baber, 198.
- Moghul Camp deteriorating in 1700 A. D., 149.
- Moghul disasters in wars in the Deccan, 22; Empire on the highway to decay, 62; Empire ceased to exist in southern India in 1738 A. D., 198; system of administration adopted by the English, 213.
- Moghuls, the masters of Hindustan, 1; Fratricide by their Kings, 2; their administration of justice, 3; their protection of travellers, 3; Deterioration of their soldiery, 11; their love of wandering, 11.
- Mokarram Khan, an Imperial General, conquered Khurdah on the Eastern coast, 23.
- Muazzam, sent in chief command to the Deccan, 111; his loyalty to his father, 128; fell under the suspicions of Aurangzeb, 137.
- Muhammed Amin Khan broke the power of the Sikhs temporarily in 1710 A. D., 169.
- Muhammed Ibrahim, the King of Golkonda's Commander-in-Chief, went over to the Imperialists, 134.
- Muhammad Khan Bangash, 196.
- Muhammad Shah, the successor of the Emperor Rafi-ud-Doulat, reigned 29 years until the sack of Delhi by the Persian conqueror, Nadir Shah, in 1739 A. D., 182; disaffection of Turanian nobles in his reign, 182; proceeded with his army against the Governo of Allahabad, 182; freed from the hands of Husain Ali Khan and Abdullah Khan, 184.
- Mukhliz Khan, 113.
- Mullah Ahmad, 101.
- Munim Khan, Chief Minister of Shah Alam, 160.
- Murad, his character, 4; besieged Surat, 57.

Musta'idd Khan, a historian, 84.

Nadir Shah, invaded India in 1738 A.D., 198; attacked Kabul and met with but little resistance, 200; came to India and routed the Moghul troops near Lahore—fought the Moghuls at Karnal—killed Khan Dauran and took Saadat Khan prisoner—Emperor visited his camp—proceeded with the Emperor to Delhi, 201; rumour of his death caused a massacre of Persian soldiers—ordered indiscriminate slaughter—his sack of Delhi—returned to Persia with enormous wealth, 202; among his spoils was the great Peacock Throne—his son married a descendant of Shah Jahan, 203.

Nagoji Manai, 148.

Nasir Khan, Governor of Kabul, 200.

Nazar Mahammad—treaty with, 52.

Nizamul Mulk, 173; incited Daud Khan Pani, Subahdar of Ahmednuggur, to oppose Husain Ali Khan, 179; determined to march from Malwa to Delhi—defeated Dilawar Ali Khan in May 1720 A.D.—defeated Alam Khan, adopted son of Husain Ali Khan, 183; appointed Wazir by Muhammad Shah, 185; when appointed Moghul ruler of the Deccan, favoured the Kolapur regency and it flourished—on his withdrawal Kolapur was on the wane, 187; advised the Emperor on certain reforms, 191; his campaign in Bhopal with the Peshwa—forced to come to an agreement with the Peshwa, 197; Governorship of Malwa and Gujarat granted to him in the name of his son Ghazi-uddin, 197.

Nur Jahan sent to Court by royal mandate—her refusal and finally her consent to marry Jahangir—rights of sovereignty granted her—her supremacy as Queen—her love of justice—title of Nur Mahal and afterwards Nur Jahan Begam bestowed on her, 17; the real ruler of the Empire—her love of orphan girls, 18; her father, called Itmad-ud-Doulah, made Prime Minister—her brother, called Itmad Khan, made Master of Ceremonies at Court—plundering of Imperial finances by her and her relations, 18; saved Jahangir from the hands of Mahabat Khan and escaped with him to the Punjab Rhotas, 28; her plans to place Shabriyar on the throne, 34.

Oxenden, 120.

Panipat rather than Plassey decided the fate of Modern India, 208.

Pantoji Gopinath, 164.

Pap Rai, attacked and plundered Warangal—the Subahdar of the Deccan captured and executed him, 170.

Parli besieged and taken by the Moghuls, 149.

Parya Naik defended Wakinkera for months, 150.

Parvez, in the Deccan, 10; defeated at the Pass of Khamnor, 19; with Mahabat Khan met Prince Kharram's forces, 25.

Peace made with the Deccan, 21.

Plague or Waba, 18.

Poki Padshah, 190.

Portuguese, in Goa under the great Viceroy Albuquerque—their lordship over the Indian Ocean, 29; their intolerance of other religions, 30; factory at Hugli came to a violent end, 47; peace made with them, 147.

Prilhad Niraji, 143.

Prince Akbar, and Tuhawar Khan entered the valley of Mewar but were dispersed with terrific slaughter, 127; his desire to take the throne from his father, Aurangzeb, 128; deserted by the Rajputs—his embarkation for Muscat—his death, 129.

Purandhar besieged by Jai Singh and surrendered, 112.

Rafi-ud-Darjah, succeeded Farokh Siar as Emperor, 181; his death after a reign of six months, 182.

Rafi-ud-Doulah succeeded Rafi-ud-Darjah as Emperor—his death after three months, 182.

Ragbunath Pundit, 123.

Raj Sing, Rana of Mewar, 127.

Raja Ajit Singh, after Aurangzeb's death, forbade the killing of cows, prevented the Muazzim calling to prayer and desecrated mosques, 163.

Raja Girdhar, 194.

Raja Jai Singh, 56.

Raja Jeswant Singh, 119.

Raja Ram, younger son of Sivaji, elected as Mahratta Chief, 143; his death, 149.

Raja Ram Singh shot dead in battle, 61.

Raja Rup Singh Rathor, his daring prowess in the battlefield, 61.

Rajput wars, 19.

Raja Ali appointed Governor of Gujarat, 193.

Rajputs the mainstay of the Moghul power 52; their triple alliance, 163; the tyranny

- of Aurangzeb completely alienated them from the Empire, 163.
- Ram Chunder, 148.
- Ram Das, the fourth Guru, 165.
- Rana Umrao Sing submitted to Prince Kharram, 19.
- Rani Parbati, 50.
- Ravi Canal, 51.
- Roshanara Begam, Aurangzeb's affectionate sister, 63.
- Rustam Khan, 61.
- Saadat Khan; his success against Baji Rao in 1736 A. D., 197.
- Sadulla Khan, 51.
- Sahu—his character, 187; territorial sovereignty granted to him and his successors, 188; obtained titular headship of the Mahrattas, 186.
- Salir, his surrender to the Moghuls, 131.
- Sambhaji, enrolled by Aurangzeb as Panjhzari, 113; left at Allahabad by Sivaji, 114; celebrated his accession by an inroad into Moghul territory—plundered and carried away an enormous amount of loot, 130; engaged in fighting the English and Portuguese, 132; his inability to eject the Portuguese from their strongholds, 133; his capture—his execution at Tolapur in August 1689 A.D., 142.
- Santaji Ghorepurai, the greatest Mahratta chieftain, 144; his death by the hand of Nagoji Manai, 148.
- Satnamis, their rebellion, 118.
- Sattara, siege of—its surrender in April 1700 A. D., 149.
- Shafi, 79.
- Shah Abbas the Great, King of Persia, 198.
- Shah Alam, became Emperor under the title of Bahadur Shah, 158; met Shah Azam's army at Jhaju—the Emperor victorious, 158; received Zulfikar Khan into the Imperial service, 159; forced by Kaam Buksh to march against him—showed the greatest kindness to him, 159; his character, 160; title of "Sayid" affixed to his name on the coins, 162; his sudden death at Lahore in 1711 A. D., 170.
- Shah Alam II reigned for forty-seven years, 207.
- Shah Ali, opposition of the Sunnis to his adding the word "wasi" after the name of the Caliph Ali, 161.
- Shah Ismail, ruler of Persia, 198.
- Shah Jahan, Asaf Khan in favour of making him Emperor, 34; proclaimed Emperor at Lahore, 35; his great monuments of Moghul architecture—his character, 36; his righteous and just administration of the country—great increase of revenue in his reign, 38; his reign one of great prosperity, 37; his great expenditure on buildings, 40; war with the Deccan princes during his reign, 43; his invasion of Golkonda, 43; his munificence during the famine, 45; his expeditions to Kuch Behar and Assam, 50; Kandahar a part of his Empire, 51; Deccan wars continued during his reign, 52; bazaars held within his harem—violent civil war in his reign, 53; rumour of his death precipitated civil war, 56; invited Aurangzeb to see him at his Imperial harem, 63; a prisoner in his harem, 63.
- Shah Nawas Khan, father-in-law of Aurangzeb, died in battle in Ajmere, 67.
- Shahriyar, who was in Lahore, assumed the royal title—fight between him and Asaf Khan—the former defeated, 35.
- Shah Sharif, 98.
- Shah Tahmasp, 199.
- Shahji—story of his wife, 98; his rise to fame, 99; allowed to return to the Karnatic, 102; died in 1664 A. D., 111.
- Sher Afghan, the husband of Nur Jahan, murdered, 17.
- Shujah, Governor of Bengal—his character, 54; took Allahabad and Benares—Aurangzeb pursued him—decisive battle at Kora, 70; forced to retreat to Bengal—driven out of Bengal—took refuge in Arakan, 71; attacked by Sulaiman Shikoh, 56; retreated to Bengal, 57.
- Sidi Johur marched against Sivaji and besieged him for four months in the fort of Pan Panalla, 107.
- Sikhs, their religion, 164; their atrocities at Sirhind, 167; their plunder of all the country between Lahore and Delhi, 168; their head-quarters, the fort at Gurdaspur in the Punjab—their ravages, 177; their organisation broken up, 178.
- Sir Buland Khan, 180.
- Sirdesmookhi (one-tenth revenue), 125.
- Sir Thomas Roe, his Embassy to the Court of Jahangir, 29; his graphic description of Indian customs, 32; obtained permission for English merchants to trade, 33.
- Sivaji, made the Mahrattas a most powerful race, 74; took possession of various forts, 100; seizure by him of three pagannahs belonging to Mullah Ahmad, 100; murdered Raja of the Jowli State and his brother and took the State, 103; seizure of the Konkan, 103; his defeat

- Fateh Khan, ruler of Jinjira, 103 ; his war with Bijapur, 166 ; his attack and murder of Raja Ghorepurai, 107 ; peace between him and Bijapur, 108 ; his attack and plunder of the Moghul troops, 108 ; entered Shah Jahan's service, 102 ; defeated by Amir-ul-Umara, 109 ; sacked Surat, 111 ; his surrender to Jai Singh, 112 ; enrolled by Aurangzeb as Panj Hazari—considered it an insult, 113 ; his stratagem to return to Mahratta land, 113 ; Prince Muazzam obtained for him the title of Raja, 114 ; enthroned as Raja at Rajgarh, 120 ; on his coronation bestowed grand titles on his officers in Sanscrit, 121 ; allied himself to Golkonda, 121 ; his letter to Venkaji, 122 ; under his rule his first care was his soldiers, 124 ; his character, 125.
- St. Francis Xavier in India, 30.
- Suchew, partizan of Tarabai, 186.*
- Sulaiman Shikoh, 56.
- Sultan Azam advanced into Bijapur in 1686 A. D. — reduced to great distress by Mahrattas getting between him and his base—relieved with great difficulty by Ghazi-ud-din Khan, 135.
- Sultan Shikoh, son of Dara Shikoh, sent to Aurangzeb by the Raja of Srinagar—imprisoned in Gwalior, 70.
- Tahawur Khan, entered the Imperial camp to put forward Prince Akbar's demands, 128 ; slain in Aurangzeb's camp, 129.
- Taj Mahal, 48.
- Tavernier, 54.
- Tara Bai, senior wife of Raja Ram, as regent to her son, succeeded him as ruler of the Mahrattas, 149 ; her struggle with Sahu for the headship of the Mahrattas—Sattara wrested from her by Sahu—her rival Court at Kolapur, 185 ; her son died of smallpox—the son of the co-wife put on the guddi, 187.
- Tegh Bahadur, the ninth Guru, executed at Delhi in Aurangzeb's reign, 165.
- Turks in the service of the Afghan Kings of Delhi, 1.
- Udaipuri, a Georgian Christian, a concubine of Aurangzeb, her influence in Court, 86.
- Venkaji, 121.
- Wakinkera, besieged and taken by the Moghuls, 150.
- Wazir Khan, Foujdar of Sirhind, attacked Banda, but was defeated and slain, 167.
- Zulfikar Khan, laid siege to Ginjee—finally took Ginjee in 1698 A. D., 147 ; one of the chief Ministers of Shah Alam, 160 ; aided Jahandar Shah to obtain the crown, 170 ; brutally murdered after his first interview with Farokh Siar, 173 ; as Governor of the Deccan, allowed the Mahrattas to collect a certain amount of chouth to keep the country quiet, 187.

